SEPARATE COATS FOR COOL DAYS.

Paris Patterns No. 3298, 3215

All Seams Allowed.

Whether the weather be warm or cold, a coat is indispensable. There are a number of light-weight woolen materials which make excellent summer jackets, and any of these may be utilized. In our illustration we show a coat which has all the novel touches which mark the garments of the present season. It has the long French darts to fit the front and corresponding long seams in the back. There is also a center back seam by which the coat is fitted in somewhat to the figure. The closing is diagonal. The neck may be finished with a small rolling collar or in blazer style without any at all. The latter is the newer style and is easier for the home seamstress. The sleeve is slightly gathered at the armhole and tapers toward the wrist. The pattern (3298) is cut in 6 sizes, 32 to 42 inches bust measure. To make the coat in the medium size will require 3 1/2 yards of 44-inch material and 5 yards of braid.

Presenting as it does a graceful and stylish form of the very popular Russian side-closing model, this coat is certain of approval for spring wear and also for summer when developed in linen or silk. As pictured it is made of gray covert cloth, darker braiding appearing on the military collar and turned-up cuffs. The buttons are cloth-covered. The shaping of the closing front is repeated in the tunic, which extends into a coat tail at the back. Materials which can be made up to advantage by this design are broadcloth, serge, chevrot, hopsacking, homespun, fancy mohair, shantung, rajah, linen, duck and crash. The pattern (3215) is in 5 sizes, 32 to 40 inches bust measure. For 36 bust the coat requires 4 yards of material 27 inches wide, with 1 1/2 yards of braid.

Price of Each Pattern, 10 cents.

rascally among the rascals of his profession in Paris, had been mixed up in many shady transactions, and not a few which were criminal, but in none heretofore which promised so ill as this. But the advanced fee he had pocketed that afternoon had been a very liberal one, and the assurance of a still more handsome douceur in return for his services had served to till his few qualms of conscience. His fears also kept him quietly waiting where he was until his clients should call upon him.

They came forth, ten minutes later, the two of them, leaving the room in which they had been dark and strange, silent, and Seager, and Seager, groping for him in the gloom, laid a hand on his sleeve, causing him to start aside in sudden alarm.

"I want you to solemnize my marriage, now, Maitre Georges," said his strange client in a very tremulous voice. "The lady's waiting upstairs—come this way. You have all the papers prepared, haven't you?"

CHAPTER XXIII.

TIME IS MONEY—AT THE RATE OF A MILLION A MINUTE.

Quaintance, backed to the wall on the landing at the top of the stairs, heard them coming. He pushed O'Ferral and Cornoyer toward the open door of the box-room behind, and they all slipped soundlessly into it, not daring even to whisper. And, presently, three pairs of shuffling feet came to a stop on the landing outside, a key turned in the locked door.

The feet shuffled onward. It seemed that another door barred their way. That in turn opened with a faint click. A ray of light shot outward ere it closed again. A man's voice spoke, and was answered by a woman's.

YORK STREET

A MILLION A MINUTE

A ROMANCE OF MODERN NEW YORK AND PARIS

BY HUDSON DOUGLAS.

"You'll write two cheques," he stipulated. "One for a hundred thousand, the other for fifty. And you give us your sacred word of honor not to molest us in any way, either now or afterwards. Here's pen and ink. Don't waste time."

The Duc took the pen from him, bowing.

"I give you my word," said he simply, and . . . here are the cheques. They are both to bearer." They will be honored whenever you care to present them. Now—let us go, if you will be so good."

"Can we trust him?" said Arendsen doubtfully.

"How can we help ourselves?" Seager demanded, and led the way to the door.

The Duc followed him, and Arendsen followed the Duc very closely, but all such precaution proved needless, for Monsieur, having resigned himself to their demands, had no intention of breaking the promise which he had made them. Seager hailed a cab as soon as he reached the street, Arendsen shepherd the Duc into it, and the three drove off together in the direction of the Latin Quarter.

Seated, silent, within the cab, as it rumbled noisily down the street, entirely sober again and thus dismally disappointed in all his long-cherished anticipation, Seager had time to think over his own grievances against fate. And these began to loom ever more loftily before his mental vision. What were a paltry ten thousand dollars to him in comparison with the ten millions the man at his side had cost him! And why should Arendsen reap so much more than himself from their mutual venture! Were all his own dreams to come to naught thus tamely?

His hands were clenched, his forehead damp, he could have gnashed his teeth and cried aloud in impotent despair, while his mind, twisting, turning, in the mesh of circumstance, could find no outlet from such pitiful predicament. The trundling cab was traveling too fast for him. He wanted time to think. There must be some way out, some slim last chance for him to clutch at.

There was!

The inspiration came to him almost too late. There was a way, a way not perhaps altogether clear, but well worth following toward that result for which his longing had grown well-nigh insupportable since it had seemed beyond his utmost reach. The cab had crossed the bridge. There was no time now to explain to Arendsen—but he would surely understand that the game was still worth the candle. They were not going to give ten millions—and the girl—up without a final desperate effort.

"Dirck!" he said whispering excitedly, while the Duc strove to understand. "I've got a plan, one that can't fail us. I'll tell you afterward. We must take Maitre Georges along."

Dirck Arendsen appeared to cogitate, but only for a moment. He too had been regretting very bitterly the paltry outcome of their enterprise. He was still to be tempted by the bait of ultimate success.

"All right," he answered. "We'll take him along. It's at your risk."

The cab was stopped. Seager jumped out, after hasty word of explanation to the Duc, who sat impatiently with Arendsen until the former came back accompanied by a little, mean-looking, black-clad fellow who clambered in with a nod of greeting, and they drove on to corner of the Impasse de Paradis where they all alighted.

The cab was dismissed, and, after it had driven away, the four turned down the cul-de-sac toward the deserted house at the top of which the Duchesse was confined.

Monsieur le Duc was no coward, and yet he shivered involuntarily as he followed Seager into the dark, dank corridor, while Arendsen carefully closed and locked the door behind the soft-footed stranger they had picked up.

"Tread quietly," Seager commanded, and they climbed with all precaution to the first floor, entering a room whose door opened noiselessly under his careful manipulation.

He struck a match, which he applied to a tallow candle stuck in a bottle upon a table littered with the remains of a meal. The Duc looked about him anxiously, and his heart sank at what he saw. The window was strongly shuttered and he was alone there with this most unprepossessing pair.

The little man had not entered, was waiting outside in a state of extreme perturbation. For Maitre Georges, sworn notary public, and the most
