A WAIF'S FORTUNES

She was taken to chapel twice every Sunday to hear prayers and sermons that all breathed the same gloomy creed. She heard prayers and sermons twice a day at Miss Pennington's.

The isolation of her lot was worst of all. She was made to feel that she was an outcast. The servants, the people who visited the house and who she saw at the chapel, all knew the main facts of her history; and as she learned more of the world and its laws the sense of shrinking shame grew. She was set apart. The taint of evil was upon her.

Mrs. Annesley did not know how Rosalie was suffering. Her mind was troubled at this time by grave anxiety caused by her husband's failing health, and early in the winter the girl received a letter from her, saying that she and Mr. Annesley were to spend some months in the South of France.

Rosalie was grieved for the sake of those who had been kind to her. It was hard, too, to feel they were going so far away, and she felt even more desolate when she knew they were gone.

She grew more and more unhappy at Miss Pennington's. Often she was blamed unjustly, often she could have cried for sheer weariness over the coarse sewing and the endless household tasks. Mrs. Deacon took a cruel delight in making her do what was roughest and most laborious, and under this treatment all Rosalie's faults sprang up like weeds in a neglected garden.

What was the use of trying to be good when nobody cared for her? What was the use of working when she was grumbled at?

And oh, heaven, was this to be her life always, this loveless, sunless lot? Must she do penance all her days?

She was reminded frequently that she was only a waif dependant upon the charity of strangers. But there were other ways in which a girl could support herself, she knew, than by such thankless toil as was hers.

What were its wages? An attic to sleep in where she lay shivering with cold in the winter nights, food and clothing. That was all. Girls earned money as painters' models. That she had learned in the old days. And Gerome's friend, Gabriel Santry, had told her to think of him as a friend. He was a nice old gentleman to Rosalie, and she did not guess how the "old" would have wounded his vanity. He had a wife and daughters, she knew.

These thoughts grew to a settled purpose at length, and a climax in Rosalie's life came one morning, when she was falsely accused of carelessness by Mrs. Deacon and rebuked sternly

HINTS FOR THE LADIES

The very latest craze for trimming the morning hat is the large, flat wing, not the kind that has been modish the past year, but a wing that is softer and that can be twisted to suit any shaped hat. These are put on to the side and rather made to lie flat on the hat. Not many are put on, either, for the desire of the milliner is to have all effects as light as possible.

While wings are very stylish, really the most effective decoration for the straw hat is flowers, and small ones are preferable. Moss roses are clumped flat, rosebuds, foliage, sweet peas—in fact, any garnishment is used so long as it is tiny and does not sit out from the hat. The best new straw that comes in packages combines black and old rose. Then, with the black again, we have dull green, dull biscuit, dull brown, etc. All the colors are dusky, and when made into hats they are chic. With such a neutral background the decoration, no matter what color, comes out splendidly without being voyant.

Shapes do not show the slightest variation. During the past year they have changed but little. The very same forms in large hats that were fashionable last summer are with us again. And all sized hats are popular, from the small round hat—which isn't small at all, but merely looks so because it is all crown—to the cone-shaped crown, with very wide brim arched on one side. Trimmings are severe, too, quite as severe as they were all winter. The only coquetry is in the way the hats are posed.

Very little of the hair shows when the new hat is pinned down flat, and that is the aim of the fashionable woman. And women's heads these by Miss Pennington. When she defended herself falsehood was added to the charge against her.

"You are a very wicked, ungrateful girl," Miss Pennington said. "You do not deserve the kindness shown to you."

"You are not kind!" blazed forth Rosalie. "You are hard and unjust, all of you!"

And with that she turned and left the two women and went up to her attic.

It was close on midday, the hour for her dinner and Miss Pennington's luncheon. She deliberately made a bundle of some of her belongings and put on her outdoor things. When she knew Mrs. Deacon would be in the housekeeper's room and Miss Pennington in the dining-room, she went out from her attic and watched and listened.

No one on stairs or landing. She went down, paused on the way to watch the parlourmaid cross the hall to the dining-room, and then ran lightly to the hall door.

She opened it, drew it quietly to behind her, and left the grim old house, feeling as if she were escaping from a prison.

CHAPTER VII.

The evil that men do lives after them;

The good is oft interred with their bones.

—Shakespeare.

No one saw Rosalie run down the path to the gate, and she gained the road and walked on with a delicious sense of freedom.

The unknown was before her; the people who had treated her so harshly were left behind. Only one thing had kept her with them so long, the desire to obey Mrs. Annesley.

She thought of that friend with anxiety. If only Mrs. Annesley had been in Blechley she would have been inclined to go to her and plead for justice and the kindness she had been denied so long. But Mrs. Annesley was far away.

Rosalie had a little money and she relied on Santry's promise to help her. She was not anxious for her own future. It could not be so hard as life at Miss Pennington's had proved.

She gained a busy thoroughfare where omnibuses and trams were passing and asked her way to Chelsea. After some difficulty she reached there and found Santry's studio, which was the address he had given her—not his private house.

By good fortune, as she thought, he was there, and she sat down in a luxurious ante-room to wait his coming, feeling as if she had strayed back to the world she used to live in.

It was a bleak day in March. The warmth from the fire and the glow of rich color about her were grateful to the forlorn girl, and presently Santry himself appeared, handsome, genial, smiling, in his picturesque painter's garb.

"Why, Rosalie, my dear little girl!" The tone was such as she had not heard for very long, and it brought the tears to her eyes.

Santry put his arm round her. "There, you shall tell me all about it presently. Were they too much for you—these good people?"

"I tried to bear it, but it was too hard. If only I had had someone to speak kindly to me sometimes—"

"Don't cry, my child. You have come to me for help? That's right! I've sent my model away, and you and I will have lunch and a talk together."

days are fearful mysteries. The amount of false hair that even young girls put on is extraordinary. Were the coiffure one that stands out, one could understand the use of so much padding; but the aim of every woman is to be as narrow-headed as possible. Yet she masses two or three switches on her head and sometimes puts in rolls at the back.

The best coiffeurs do not advise the use of so much hair. All they seem to desire is the calot or round, coconut shaped piece at the back, and sometimes a braid around the head. But as some women dress their heads, they might as well employ a wig, for the injury done the hair in the end is about as bad. The coiffeur's aim is to have the view from the front as flat and as narrow as it can be made. It is from a side view that the elongation shows. For this, the calot placed half way between the nape of the neck and the top of the head, with the masses of hair put about it, accomplishes the purpose.

THE AUTOMOBILE IS KILLING THE BOND BUSINESS

Failure of the investor to come forward this month with any considerable portion of his mid-year interest and dividend money for reinvestment, stimulated denunciations of the automobile among bond salesmen and bond dealers. Some of them border on the conviction that the country is going bankrupt on automobiles. Not only do people spend money for automobiles which else might go into bonds, but they are found frequently to be taking money out of bonds and spending it on automobiles.

The bond salesmen see more of this particular form of extravagance than any other class of observing men, is probably due to the fact that they are the most painstaking in the hunt for unspent capital, and when they have located it and are about to get it invested in a bond they take it hard to see it suddenly whisked away and invested in a fragile automobile instead. Instances are in endless variety. One bond man said this week: "It's getting worse all the time. The cashier of a bank, to whom I have sold a lot of stuff in the past, just laughed at me. 'Bonds' said he. 'What have we to do with bonds? Well, he borrowed money on his life insurance policy, and is going around the corner to buy a car.' Another bond man added: 'That's nothing. A client of ours came in with a bond of large denomination and asked us to split it up and sell $2,000 of it at once. He wanted to take the money with him. We said it would be very difficult to realize the cash while he waited, but he would have it, and we asked him why such haste. He was going off on a motor trip, he said, and he needed new tires and a lot of things. He got the money.'"

THE INDIAN VICE-ROYALTY

As belonging to the British Empire the people of Canada have an interest in everything that goes on in any part of it. And there are special reasons why the appointment of a new viceroy of India should be one of interest to Canadians. Asia and things Asiatic have a real concern for a country which abuts on an ocean, the other shore of which bounds that continent. Nor are some of the people of Britain's great eastern empire altogether personally unknown to us. Sikhs and Hindus from among the numerous races which are comprised in the population of India, are found in our community and but a few years ago their coming to our shores was the occasion of not a little controversy that threatened at one time to approach almost the importance of the old problem of Chinese exclusion. Besides this direct and personal concern in the matter of immigration from India, as British subjects we are deeply interested in the peace and welfare of the great possession of the crown, the foundations of which were laid by the valor of Clive and the political genius of Warren Hastings.

In the choice of the representative of the King in India, the quietude and prosperity of that country greatly depend on a wise selection of the man to fill that position. It is not surprising, therefore, that Mr. Asquith is receiving congratulations from all sides on his appointment of Sir Charles Hardinge to that high office. The grandson of a great soldier who won fame and honor by his victories over some of the most warlike races in India in the earlier decades of the last century, the name of the new Viceroy will not be unfamiliar to the people over whom he will rule. Nor will he go to Calcutta without considerable knowledge of the relations existing between India and some of the neighboring countries in Asia. Sir Charles Hardinge while in the British diplomatic service, was for some time at Teheran and St. Petersburg, and became acquainted with matters concerning the political relations of those countries with India. As the permanent under-secretary for foreign affairs, Sir Charles Hardinge has had further opportunities for becoming conversant with British relations with foreign powers. His tact and gentility will stand him in good stead in dealing with the friction that has not entirely died out in regard to the partition of Bengal, while his industry and application will enable him to master the immense mass of correspondence which, notwithstanding the telegraph, still distinguishes the administration of India almost as much as it did in the distant days of "John Company."
