A MILLION A MINUTE

A ROMANCE OF MODERN NEW YORK AND PARIS
BY HUDSON DOUGLAS.

"And this car, Fanchette?" she inquired, looking over her shoulder. "Where did it come from?"

"I borrowed it," replied Fanchette briefly. "I am to return it to its owner as soon as we reach New York."

She compressed her lips, determined to part with no further explanation on that point, but the precaution was needless. Her charge was accustomed to taking a good deal for granted when Fanchette assumed control, and results had always justified her in her confidence.

"What are you going to do when we get there?" she asked reflectively, and Fanchette swiftly unfolded the scheme she had formed.

"I think," she suggested, "that while Monsieur is in this country, we should hasten back to Paris that you may obtain the money you still have left in the bank there. It will be easy enough to withdraw it in person while he is absent. And, with it, you will be free to return to America, or you might live in England at less expense, or—There are other countries also. If we go at once, there will be the less risk, and we can learn in Paris when he is expected back, so that we may be elsewhere before he arrives."

"That seems a good plan," the girl agreed wearily.

"And we might go on to London from Paris. It should surely be possible to bury oneself there. I've paid a long price for my folly, Fanchette, and you've paid heavily, too. I don't know what I'd be doing without you. Life wouldn't be worth living now, if I were entirely alone."

Fanchette fondled the white hand on the steering wheel.

"I shall always be mademoiselle's to command," she replied with a tender formality meant to conceal the wistful affection which was making her voice tremble. And, having thus mapped out their immediate future, they both fell silent again.

Mile after mile dropped away from the whirling wheels, and Fanchette felt ever more confident that her appeal to the owner of the providential car had not failed of good effect. She had been dumbly dreading that, somewhere along the road, a policeman would spring out and stop them, bid them turn back to Stormport and take him with them. In which case she could but admit that she was thief and a robber, beg that her innocent mistress should be allowed to proceed by train to the city. But, as dusk settled over the open landscape, she plucked up heart and when, after a fast run, they had driven unharmed through the lighted streets of Jamaica, she had almost discounted the possibility that they might still be held up at the ferry ahead of them.

She was the more dismayed, therefore, as a man hailed them when they drove into the dock and stooped down to identify the registered number in front of the car. She had thrown the rug from her knees in readiness to descend and be marched off to prison, when he came forward holding out a yellow envelope, which, she felt sure, must be legal warrant for her arrest.

"For Miss Dagmar," he announced briefly, and, having handed it to that astonished damsel, made off without more ado.

There was no time to open it then and, while they crept forward on to the ferry, Fanchette made full confession of her misdeed.

"Jump out and leave me now, mamselle," she begged in conclusion as they came to a standstill on deck. "Here is the money I got for you, four hundred and fifty dollars. You must escape with the crowd at the other side, and leave me to explain matters to the police."

The girl looked grave, and made no reply until she had opened the envelope. The message it held merely said:

"I have found the bracelet. Please leave word where I may deliver it. Hope you have had a pleasant run. Newman."

She read that out to Fanchette, and then had to confess her own encounter with the car's owner, so that, in view of his unexpected urbanity under grave grievance, neither had any fault to find with the other, and both were inwardly prepossessed by the tact he had displayed in a position which could not have been most aggravating to him.

Fanchette's fears thus finally dissipated she even ventured to justify herself in her evil-doing, and the girl did not contradict her assertion that in any case, all had turned out for the very best. She herself was thinking of the strong, sun-tanned face of the fearless, but very appealing brown eyes she had left behind on

MUSIC CONQUERS INFANT PARALYSIS

Amazing Results Obtained in London
Institution by the Scientific Use of Rhythm.

London, May 7.—The wonderful results which can be obtained by the scientific use of music and rhythm in infantile paralysis was the subject of an impromptu demonstration the other day at the "Tiny Tim" Guild an institution for the treatment of paralyzed children who are considered incurable at the general hospitals.

The first interesting case shown was that of a boy six, whose right arm had been totally paralyzed. A drum and his zeal in beating it in time so as to become a professional drummer, when he grows up, have been his salvation. What massage and electrical treatment could not do constant working at his drumming has accomplished, and now the paralyzed arm is almost as useful as the other.

Another patient was a child of three who six months ago was totally paralyzed in both legs. Her treatment consisted of "marching", while seated on the edge of a low wooden chair, to an inspiring tune placed on the piano.

"The secret of the treatment" explained Miss Hawthorne, the founder of the Guild "is to make them build up the strength of the paralyzed muscles and nerves by encouraging them to use their limbs in the way each individual likes best. The music keeps their interest up and prevents them becoming tired and bored."

The most interesting case of all was a ten-year-old girl who three years ago was refused admission as hopelessly incurable at one of the great London hospitals. On being brought to the Guild the right leg and arm were almost useless, while paralysis of certain of the throat and tongue muscles rendered the child's speech incoherent. Dull and mentally deficient in many ways, her interest in musical sounds gave the clue to the treatment. Singing exercises were devised in which, to pronounce the vowels correctly, the semi-paralyzed muscles had to be used, while a wooden clapper and bell, to be sounded by the paralyzed foot and arm respectively, completed the apparatus.

At this demonstration, after almost three years' treatment at the Guild, this patient, now a normal looking little girl of ten, sang a number of songs in a rich, full voice, pronouncing the words faultlessly, lessly, and then, as a grand finale, gave a skipping rope dance to show the marvellous control, the musical treatment had gained over the once paralyzed limb muscles.

MARYSVILLE NEWS

May 7—Misses Alise Healey and Ella M. Pickering of Halifax, N. S. were in town Thursday, visiting friends.

Miss Alta Minue of Marysville, formerly of Gibson, left on Friday for Chipman, N. B., to take charge of a dressmaking establishment.

Miss Laura Likely left on Friday morning for Centerville, N. B., to go into the millinery business.

Mrs. Cadwallader of Fredericton accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Estabrooks of New York, were the guests of Mrs. Alex. Robinson last evening, coming up to attend the missionary meeting.

Miss McAloon of Stanley, is in town.

The Women's Auxiliary of the Missionary Society in connection with the Methodist Church, held a very pleasant and successful entertainment on Friday evening at the residence of Mrs. Williams. The following programme was carried out:

Singing and responsive reading. Reading, by Miss Bird. Piano Solo—Miss Mary Robinson. Mrs. Byron Coulthard of Fredericton gave an instructive talk on mite boxes.

Refreshments were served by the mission Circle.

An interesting feature of the entertainment was the opening of the mite boxes, from which quite a substantial sum was realized. There was the beach, wondering what the man who was always successful would say if he could hear her own sad story of failure. And she did not crumple the telegram up, but kept it smooth and carried it to the hotel with her.

She drove along Twenty-ninth street to the Martha Washington, and, leaving Fanchette to look to the baggage, sat down at a desk to pen a reply. Fanchette took that and the car to the Fifth Avenue Hotel, where she entrusted both to the guardian of the Twenty-fourth street entrance, who willingly took charge of them after he had recovered from his first astonishment at sight of such an unusual chauffeur. When she got back to Twenty-ninth street she found her mistress poring over a steamship guide.

"There's a boat for Havre tomorrow at ten, Fanchette," said the girl "and I've booked two berths."

LADIES' TUCKED SHIRTWAIST.

Paris Pattern No. 2051

All Seams Allowed.

This simple shirt-waist model, with its two broad tucks turning toward the shoulder, is suitable for taffetas, as well as for cashmere, albatross or French flannel. Any of the heavy linens or Madras would look equally well made in this style, and chambray, Indian-head cotton, Victoria or Persian lawns are also good materials for its development. In gray and black striped handkerchief linen, worn with a linen collar and a broad tie of black satin, it would be suitable for every-day wear. The pattern is in 8 sizes—32 to 46 inches, bust measure. For 36 bust the waist requires 4½ yards of material 20 inches wide, 3½ yards 27 inches wide, 2½ yards 36 inches wide and 2½ yards 42 inches wide.

Price of pattern, 10 cents.
