A WAIF'S FORTUNES

"Oh, no," said Rosalie wondering. "I never thought of such a thing till—till that evening. Some friends came, one a gentleman I never saw before, and I heard him ask the other why Gerome did not marry me. I thought it so strange."

"Yet he should have made you his wife, Rosalie. He had no right—oh, it was cruel of him to wrong you so."

For the moment Mrs. Annesley's womanly championship of the weak and helpless overcame her discretion, and Rosalie angrily snatched her hands away from those that had been holding them.

"You shall not speak so. How dare you! He was never cruel to me. He loved me. He was all I had in the world, and I belonged to him. Oh!"—she burst into tears ago—"I cannot understand! Everything is so strange now he is gone!"

"I know—I know. Yet you must listen to me, Rosalie, and try to understand," Mrs. Annesley said. "When a man loves a girl as Gerome Delarieux loved you, he sins against heaven and against her, unless the love is sanctified by marriage. I try not to judge him harshly, any more than I judge you; for how can I tell what unhappiness had warped his mind and caused him to live as he did—a social outlaw. I only know that you must realize that you have done wrong. Most likely you will come in contact with the world now, and—You were meant to be a good woman, not for the misery that sin must bring. On, child, I want so much to help you, and I cannot—I cannot, unless I first teach you to regard evil in its true light."

All the while Mrs. Annesley was feeling that harsher lips would tell the truths that she was striving to reveal.

And so it proved; for Catherine Delarieux did not spare the girl who, in a measure, was now cast upon her care.

Mr. and Mrs. Annesley hoped that Gerome Delarieux had left a will, providing for Rosalie, but no will was found.

All that he had lapsed to his younger brother, Louis; and Rosalie was left penniless, homeless, and at the mercy of cold-hearted strangers; left, too, to the knowledge that there was a blight upon her, sully the whiteness of her youth. Her awakening was very bitter. Even the deep sorrow and bereavement could not overwhelm that strange new pain that was born of the consciousness of shame.

CHAPTER V.

Then One I took to be the gardener came;

To whom I cried: "Sir, is it nought to Thee

That sin and sorrow spoil Thy flowerets sweet?"

For answer He but called me by my name,

And—as I doubted—turned and looked at me,

Who said, "Rabboni," falling at His feet.

WONDERFUL DOLLS' HOUSE FINISHED

Miniature Palace with Priceless Furnishings
Has Taken Five Years to Build

London, July 20.—Interest at the Dolls' Bazaar centred around the contents of a wonderful dolls' house. The structure is about seven feet square, and it was made at Wilton House, Salisbury, the work occupying five years. Captain Wilkinson (Ulster King of Arms), who is an expert on heraldry and the fine arts, designed the "residence" and carved the splendid doors which connect the reception rooms.

Queen Alexandra opened this dolls' house with a golden key two years ago. The structure took five years to make. As far as possible, only antique furniture, silver and china are used.

The library is fairly complete. There are volumes of the poets in tooled vellum and shagreen, which measure half an inch in length, and there are "mighty tomes" dated 1624, which could be hidden in a man's hand.

THE VISITORS' BOOK.

On the hall table lay a visitors' book, the size of a postage stamp. As Queen Alexandra was the first guest to enter the dolls' house, hers is the first signature on the fly-leaf. King Edward inscribed his name in 1908.

Everything is Lilliputian in size. The Jacobean buffet is eight inches long, and close by is an old oak table of corresponding dimensions. A Georgian silver beaker the size of a thimble is flanked by diminutive Queen Anne candlesticks, and a silver-gilt Nuremberg tankard, old Dutch candle sconces, rare Chiddingfold and Venetian glasses, a Dresden coffee service, silver salvers, and tea and coffee urns are among the matchless curios-

That house which had been home to Rosalie so long could be home to her no longer. Strangers had invaded it, and she was made to feel that she had no right there.

On the day of the funeral she left the villa for the Vicarage. It was the kindness of the Annesleys that endeavored to make it seem to her that she was asked to pay a visit; but the desolate girl knew, as she went out from the door, that she was never to enter it again.

She had looked her last on the rooms Gerome Delarieux had made beautiful for her especial use; on the rooms where they had spent so many happy hours together, on the gardens where they had so often lingered, and on the nook where her pet Jacky lay buried. For Jacky had lived to share the happiness of his mistress, and his loss, a few months before, had been a great grief to her. Gerome had comforted her with his loving words and caresses.

And now Gerome was gone, and she scarcely cared what the future might bring to her as she lay crying in the dark, in the neat little room at the Vicarage, that looked so cold and bare after the luxury to which she had grown accustomed.

Yet she was grateful, next day, to the friends who had taken her in; and her great desire was to please Mrs. Annesley.

Mrs. Delarieux was grateful to the Annesleys also. They were helping her over a difficulty. She called at the Vicarage and talked to Rosalie, with a view to still further impress her with her sinfulness; and she had a long confab with the Annesleys concerning the problem of the girl's future.

Mrs. Annesley found Rosalie, afterwards in tears. A book which she had given the girl to read lay near, unneeded. It was a book which had brought comfort to many a troubled soul, and it had its abiding-place on a shelf in Mrs. Annesley's own room, beside Thomas a Kempis—the "Eternal Hope" of Farrar.

The vicar's wife sat down beside the sorrowing girl and took the slim, cold hand in her own. She did not speak, but the little hand gave back an answering pressure, and Rosalie's blue eyes looked up at her swimming in tears.

"Mrs. Annesley, will you tell me something?"

"Yes, my dear, if I can."

"Is it true that everyone will shun me now, and that I can never be like other girls?"

"Rosalie, put such dreadful thoughts away from you. How came they in your mind?"

"It was what Mrs. Delarieux said. I must suffer all my life because I have done wrong. I never harmed her? Why is she so hard on me? You and Mr. Annesley are good; but you came to me, and you have let me come here. What you say must be right. I want—because you have been so good to me—I want to please you. Yet what can I do—oh, what can I do, if all my life others will despise me? I did not know! And now—"

The grand piano is a masterpiece of satinwood and marquetry. It is a perfect model, thoroughly in tune, and can be played upon, although a child's hand would span the whole keyboard. It is the work of Mr. Putland, but a magnifying glass is necessary to decipher his name on the tablet which appears in the usual place over the keyboard. A burglar might carry off most of the contents of the room, piano included, in a bowler hat.

GUEST WAS CAUGHT BY HIS WHISKERS

Hotel Chambermaid Released Poor Unfortunate After Many Hours of Agony.

Sussex, N. B., July 19.—An odd little adventure more humorous than tragic, happened in a hotel the other week, the victim being a guest named Morris Steigers, who rejoiced in the possession of a twenty-eight inch growth of flowing whiskers.

As Katie Merrill who handles the linen on the top floor of the hotel was tripping down a hallway, she saw apparently hanging from a door knob what looked like a woman's switch. It was gray and fully twenty inches long.

"Mercy!" quoth Katie. "What a peculiar place for a switch."

Then Katie looked closer and discovered that the bunch was held fast to the door jamb. With a pass key she opened the door, when Steigers, toppled backward very much exhausted, but once more a free man.

Steigers, while writing a letter, had felt a draught and gone to the door to close it. A gust of wind wafted his whiskers outward and they were caught when the door slammed. It was a catch lock and he was held a prisoner for over an hour because he
