THE MAIL'S SHORT STORY

THE NEW NEIGHBOR

"It is a crying shame!" exclaimed Miss Ursula, bursting into the drawing-room. "The house is sold, and we cannot renew the lease! Mr. Dallas tells me that the sale was effected two days ago, and a note to that effect was to be sent to us to-day."

"Who's bought it?"
"I don't know. Some man who wants to take possession at once. As there are only three months of our lease to run, we shall have to move."

"What about the empty house next door?" demanded Daisy. "Would it do?"
"You don't know what you are talking about, child," answered Miss Ursula scornfully. "The house next door is not a patch on this, neither in style nor size. Then the garden! It is a wilderness compared with ours. It would not do at all."

"Still," put in Miss Priscilla, "where shall we find a better residence? It would be better to remain in West Street since it is the most select in the town."

"True; but think how odious it would be to have that outsider for our next-door neighbor."

"Well," remarked Miss Priscilla viciously, "we might have the pleasure of ignoring him, and so showing our contempt for him. I think we ought to consider the idea."

And they did, with the result that they decided not only to rent the house, but, fearful lest such a calamity should befall them again, they bought No. 12, West Street.

Then began a period of discontent and lamentation. The two elderly ladies were constantly going to and fro between No. 11 and No. 12 to the accompaniment of moans and groans. They would never be able to pack all their furniture in such a small house. The garden, too, had run to seed—it would take years before it looked really pretty—while that horrid man would gather their flowers, their lovely roses.

Truly, the Misses Gray had some cause for discontent. They had been born in this, the best house in Fernhampton. Its memories were very dear to them, not less so because they were memories of sad events, disappointments, and sorrows.

A year previous to the opening of this story a little sunshine entered their life again when their niece, who had recently lost both father and mother, came to reside with them in Fernhampton. Daisy, brought up in a healthy, broad, English manner, had some difficulty in accommodating herself to the cramped and narrow atmosphere of her aunt's house.

Both her aunts had agreed that they would screen the child from experiences and disappointments such as theirs had been—above all, from the peridies of men.

To such an end they decided not to let her have any intercourse with young men. She never went out unaccompanied by one or both of her aunts.

The 1st of April saw the Misses Gray installed in their new house, from which they watched the workmen going into No. 11 to overhaul, repaint, and redecorate. Their furniture was brought in, two tidy servants took possession of the house, and one morning they heard that the new neighbor had arrived.

As is inevitable in a little town, Marchmont, the new owner of No. 11 soon learned to know his neighbors by sight. He had not been living in Fernhampton more than a week when he met the trio. The two elderly ladies marching stiffly on each side of Daisy put him in mind of two policemen acting as bodyguard to the very pretty girl walking between them. He lifted his hat politely, but both sisters gazed through him unconcerned. Not so their niece, Daisy. With a face full of mischief, the suspicion of a smile playing upon her lips, she flashed a glance at him, inclining her head as she passed.

"Daisy!" cried Miss Ursula, almost before they were out of hearing "how can you bow to a stranger?"

"Why, auntie, he bowed to us and we know he is Mr. Marchmont."

"He is a stranger to you, is he not?"

"Of course, auntie; but I thought you would return his bow."

"What! Bow to a man that I have not been introduced to! We shall never do so!"

"No," added Miss Priscilla; "and we shall take care not to allow ourselves to be introduced to him; he has not proved himself a gentleman."

"Well, he looks one, anyhow," answered Michiel.

Miss Ursula's face took a sterner expression as she said:

"You will oblige me in future by not looking at the gentlemen you meet, Daisy, and at Mr. Marchmont in particular."

Next day they altered the hour of their constitutional; for a few days they did not meet Marchmont. Three or four days later, however, they came upon him at a bend in the road.

The spirit of mischief at once seized Daisy. But they had only passed him a few steps when a voice said, behind them:

"Excuse me, I believe this is yours!"
"Oh, thank you so much! It is mine!" cried Daisy. "How could I be so careless!"

The stranger smilingly handed her the little square of lace. Her little gloved hand touched his as she took it, and she returned his smile, showing her little white teeth. They exchanged a long glance, then he raised his hat, and they separated.

But Daisy had to pay dear for her act of treachery. Before returning home she wished that she were deaf. Scolding on the right for her carelessness, homily on the left for her forwardness, nearly drove her to open revolt. Yet what had she done?

After this, to the sisters' vexation Mr. Marchmont seemed to be always abroad, and they met him constantly. Invariably there was a quick exchange of glances, a bow—for Daisy would not be denied that it was her duty to bow to him as an acknowledgment of his past kindness in returning her handkerchief—and Marchmont would return home to dream.

It was a hot summer afternoon; the blinds were pulled down, shutting out the sun's rays from Miss Gray's drawing-room.

The two ladies were dozing in their armchairs, while Daisy worked, or pretended to, at some light fancy-work. Bijou, Daisy's beautiful blue Persian kitten, waking up from her siesta in the garden leisurely stretched herself, then began to play. Some rustling leaves roused her lazy spirits; soon she was racing round the garden, as kittens will. A butterfly, flirting with the leaves of the apricot-tree on the wall, arrested her attention. Up she climbed to catch it. Higher it went, reaching the top of the wall at a point where an old lilac-tree met and mingled with the spreading branches of a sycamore on the other side. The kitten lost sight of the bright insect, but her elevated position roused a spirit of adventure in Bijou. Her notions of property and propriety being very confused, she passed from the lilac into the branches of the sycamore in the neighbor's garden, then she paused. For, stretched upon a chair in the shade of the tree upon which she was scampering, she beheld Marchmont. At that moment he happened to lift his eyes from the book he was reading, and beheld the lovely creature.

"Puss, puss—pretty puss!"
"She must belong to next door," thought Marchmont. "I might take her back."

He made a movement but the kitten jumped on to a higher branch. Marchmont called one of the maids.

"Take my compliments to Miss Gray," said Marchmont, "and say that her kitten is in one of the trees here. Perhaps she will come in for her."

The message was delivered to the three ladies in the drawing-room.

THE DEADLY HOUSE FLY

The campaign against the house-fly is proceeding this year as never before, says Good Housekeeping Moving pictures, secured in England for this special purpose by the American Civic Association, are being shown at the theatres of the regular amusement circuits far and wide. These are accompanied by a short talk setting forth the dangerous habits of the fly. Lantern slides, with accompanying talks, are being exhibited by associations, schools, etc., to stimulate the public to fight what is sometimes termed the most dangerous animal on earth. Compulsory cleanliness is in force in some states through boards of health, notably in Florida, Georgia and Kansas.

To kill all the flies in a room, put a spoonful of formalin or formaldehyde in a quart or a pint of water, and set where they can drink it. Another poison, which is not dangerous to human life is bichloride of potash in solution. Dissolve one dram of the drug which can be bought at any drug store, in two ounces of water and add a little sugar for sweetening. Expose this solution in shallow dishes.

"At the present time," said a recent issue of the New York Medical Journal "the house fly—and this does not necessarily exclude other flies—stands accused of transmitting tuberculosis, leprosy, cholera, summer diarrhoea of children, plague, carbuncle yaws, oyster, tapeworm, swine's plague and typhoid fever; and it may be confidently asserted that we have already a sufficient amount of experimental and clinical evidence to prove our case against it."

ONE-PIECE EMPIRE DRESSING SACK.

Paris Pattern No. 3293
All Seams Allowed.

Always graceful and ladylike, the empire dressing sack comes back to us season after season. In our illustration we show a model which is one of the loveliest of the novelties in this line. It is cut with the seamless shoulder, which gives a very graceful curve, and what little fitting there is is accomplished by means of the seam under the arm, which continues along the under side of the sleeves as well. The only trimming of this garment is the ornamental collar, and if the maker prefers this may be stitched flat and become only a trimming. Around the somewhat high waist large buttonholes are worked, and through these ribbon is run and is tied in front. Such materials as India silk, crepe, either cotton or silk; lawn, organdie and many of the mercerized cotton fabrics, may be used in making this garment. The pattern is in 7 sizes, 32 to 44 inches bust measure. To make it in the medium size will require 1 1/2 yards of material 36 inches wide, with 1/2 yard of contrasting fabric 24 inches wide to trim as illustrated.

Price of pattern, 10 cents.
