A HOLIDAY ROMANCE

BY MRS. WELLESLEY-SMITH

He put down his hat on the nearest table, and looked round inquiringly. "Are we quite alone, Lady Alver?" he asked.

"What do you mean, sir?"—frowning. "Can anyone overhear us?"

"Certainly not!"—freezingly. "I should be glad if you would state your business without any further preamble; my time is much occupied by the hand towards a chair."

Mr. Graham deposited his bulky person on a small and uncomfortable seat carefully.

"I think," he said sulkily, "that you have a Miss Arderne staying with you at the moment?"

"What if I have?"—haughtily. "The young lady is entirely a stranger to you?" went on the lawyer.

"My dear madam, believe me, it will pay you best to answer my questions. I have excellent reasons for asking them, as I shall prove to you."

"Miss Arderne is a friend of my son's"—very stiffly indeed. But his eyes, trained in a profession that requires keenness of perception, noted that her color faded slightly.

"Ah!"

He leant forward, and his voice sank to a confidential whisper.

"Has your ladyship an eye for family likenesses?"

Lady Alver sat bolt upright. "What do you mean?" she gasped.

"I see that you have noticed the amazing resemblance that Miss Arderne—"

"What is it to do with you?" the tortured woman cried.

Mr. Graham shrugged his shoulders.

"Each for himself or herself, as the case may be, in this world," he returned coolly. "Come, Lady Alver, what is the use of pretending with me, now I know perfectly well exactly how you feel in this matter; and, really, I cannot blame you."

"You are mad, or talking in riddles!" she ejaculated in a stifled tone.

"Mad, am I?"—with an unpleasant smile. "We shall see about that! Shall I speak plainly to Lord Alver, for instance? You think I am merely talking wildly. Let me prove to you that you are mistaken."

He whispered urgently into her ear, and her ladyship sank back in her comfortable chair, and stared at him with frightened eyes.

"You see, it is useless to deny it," Mr. Graham said, thoroughly enjoying her utter discomfiture.

"But how—" she began, with an effort to collect herself.

"Ah, that is a little secret best kept to myself. I don't mind admitting that I am not a rich man."

He paused, and she looked at him interrogatively.

"Yes?" she murmured.

"I always welcome any chance of increasing my banking account—any legitimate chance, I ought to say—"

hastily. "I see"—thoughtfully.

A moment's silence; then he added suavely:

"Silence in such a matter is worth a good round sum; silence and assistance in removing the stumbling-block from the path your dainty feet tread is worth a small fortune—eh, your ladyship?"

"I am willing to come to terms," Lady Alver said, after a pause, "provided you agree to my conditions."

"Let me hear them," briskly. "But first, when will Miss Arderne return? It is inadvisable that she should know of my visit, I think."

"She will not be in until late this afternoon"—coldly. "Now, Mr. Graham, how much do you want?"

"I think the Isle of Wright is quite the most delightful place in the world!" declared Janet enthusiastically.

"Each spot is prettier than the last. I have heard so much of Black-gang"—looking round her with appreciative eyes. "I should like to live somewhere about here."

"It might be managed," Lord Alver said. "What place would you prefer?"

Janet was not looking at his face, so missed the expression in his handsome, ardent eyes.

"I can hardly decide. I like Shanklin, and Ryde, too. Cowes is a dear place, the streets look as though they had been hearthstoned."

"Yachting at Cowes is most enjoyable."

"So I should imagine. You have such a lovely yacht, too—the 'Pearl,' isn't it?"

"No; the 'Janet'—coolly. She colored warmly.

"Nonsense! You are laughing at me!"

"Indeed I am not."

He moved closer to her side. She was sitting on a rock watching the sea.

"It used to be the Pearl, but I had her rechristened only the other day."

"Oh!" she said nervously. "I called her after you"—boldly.

"So I supposed," Janet drew a long breath. "It is really very flattering that you should adopt my name. Now, for my part, I don't care much for it, it is so homely."

"It is the dearest, sweetest name in the world!" he said, with fervour.

There was no one in sight, they were quite alone, and he ventured to lay his hand on hers.

"Janet, my dearest, my darling, have you guessed that I love you?"

"No-o—that is, I was not sure!" stammered the girl, her heart beating to suffocation.

He smiled tenderly. "Sweetheart, will you marry me?"

he asked simply and directly.

For a moment she sat motionless, tongue-tied, conscious only of the great joy that seized her. He loved her—Janet Arderne, the shabby school teacher. It seemed too good to be true.

Dazzled with the vista of happiness that rose before her, Janet closed her eyes, and murmured a heart-felt prayer of thanksgiving.

ORDERS PROMPTLY ATTENDED TO

I have a few shares of stock of the United Butchers' Supply Corporation, under the laws of Commonwealth of Massachusetts and doing a daily cash business. I believe this stock will pay dividends of more than 10 per cent. on every dollar you invest in it. The corporation owns and controls valuable patents. The reason it is placing this stock on the market is to increase the factory space and present capacity. The above is practically a monopoly with no competition. In a very short while this stock should be worth a great deal more than its par value. It is now selling at $10 par. This is not a risk. It is a sure thing. This business has existed four years and each day has brought a larger increase in its present capacity. Full information and circular from
