WOMAN CHARGED WITH MURDERING HUSBAND

Denber, Nov. 18—Great interest is manifested here in the case of Mrs. Gertrude G. Patterson on the opening of whose trial upon the charge of having murdered her husband Charles A. Patterson, on September 25 last is set for next Monday in the criminal Court of this city. Both the State and the defense are reported to be ready for the trial and it is expected that the proceedings will be unusually interesting and sensational.

The tragical death of Charles A. Patterson formerly a promising young man with a bright mind and a fine athletic record, but at the time of his death a physical wreck suffering from tuberculosis, was the culmination of several years of misery owing to domestic infelicity. Patterson came from a good family. His mother is the principal of one of Chicago's public schools and his brother Harry S. Patterson, is one of the counsel for the International Harvester Company.

Charles A. Patterson was a high school student in 1907 and stood well in his studies, besides being one of the crack athletes of the school. While roller-racing in the winter of that year, when he won the championship of Illinois, Charles became acquainted with Gertrude Gibson, a handsome and attractive girl a few years older than himself. It seemed a case of mutual love at first sight, although later events had a strong tendency to make this match appear in a somewhat different light. It was the girl who proposed marriage and the boy was only too willing to accept the proposal. They were married in Chicago in 1908 and for a while seemed to live happily in a handsomely furnished flat on the South Side.

The marital happiness did not last long. Confessions which his young wife was said to have made to him concerning her former relations with Emil W. Strauss, head of the firm of Strauss, Bisendrach & Co., clothing manufacturers in Chicago changed young Patterson's life from happiness to misery. He began to suspect that his wife, although she had tried to minimize her guilt in her confessions and had asserted that she had completely severed her connections with Strauss, was not true to him, but continued her intercourse with Strauss and received money from the latter.

Only a few months after her marriage to Patterson Gertrude Patterson left her home and went to Europe, where, it is said, she travelled several months with Mr. Strauss. During her absence Patterson had an attack of pneumonia, which left him an invalid suffering from tuberculosis. He was not a strong character and, though knowing his wife's past and realizing that he had ample cause for jealousy, he continued to love her and would have willingly condoned all her past offences had she reformed and remained true to him. Partly on account of his physical condition, partly because of the great unrest and unhappiness which poisoned his life, the young man who was only twenty six years of age was unable to work and his mother and his brother supported him.

When Gertrude Patterson returned from Europe, her husband took her back and for a while peace seemed to reign in their house. Patterson's health, however, failed so rapidly that he went to Denver, accompanied by his wife. The change of climate only temporarily benefited Patterson's condition. After six or seven months he became so ill that he entered a sanitarium for consumptives. His wife on September 10 filed a suit for divorce against him in Denver, charging cruelty and about a week later Patterson filed a suit in Chicago against Strauss, asking $25,000 damages for alienating his wife's affections.

On the afternoon of September 25 last Mrs. Patterson called at the sanitarium and asked for an interview with her husband, hoping to induce him to withdraw his suit against Strauss. They took a walk in the suburb of Montclair and during an altercation Mrs. Patterson it is charged shot and killed her husband with a revolver, firing two bullets in the back. She was arrested and, upon the testimony of several witnesses formally charged with murder. When arraigned she pleaded not guilty and claimed that she had fired the shots in self defence.

THE STOCK MARKET TODAY RATHER SLUGGISH IN TONE

New York, N. Y., Nov. 20—The stock markets susceptibility to political factors will be in some degree tested this week by the resumption of sittings by the Stanley investigating committee. The Government's suit against the Steel corporation has forestalled the activities of the committee but it is entirely possible that something of a disturbing character will duplicate, if even this be not more than a general reminder that hostility to combinations of capital has not ceased. These influences, however, have been largely discounted and there is a disposition in nearly every quarter to give more attention to the favorable aspect of the situation at large. This attitude is warranted by recent developments in certain leading lines of business particularly copper and Steel. The demand for these products has shown a healthy expansion during the last month and as these two lines are regarded as a barometer of general business there is reason to expect general improvement although the degree will be governed largely by developments in the political situation. Mr. Roosevelt's recent utterances on trust question is interpreted as a sign of revulsion of popular feeling on this subject toward conservatism. At any rate with the terms of the Sherman defined by the courts, the unwarranted fear of property destruction has been eliminated. The money outlook is particularly favorable, some observers even predicting a glut of funds at the large financial trade centres in the near future, which of itself would foreshadow higher prices for securities. While frequent reactions are to be expected at this level the prospects still favors an advancing market.
