THE DOUBLE CROSS

Half a dozen Indian servants here approached the Don to speak with him regarding certain preparations for the danza that was to follow: Royal, at the same time, halted his horse in the archway and called to me:

"Ain't we goin' to say goodbye, St. John?"

I walked up to him. "The money is safe?" he asked in the lowest tone he had used that day.

"Quite!"

"In the vault?"

"Yes."

"All of it?"

"None of your d— business!"

"S'long!"

And Messrs. Royal and Company then pell-melled down the mountain, leaving me mightily puzzled about a "whole lot" of things.

What had Royal said at the conference?

"Too late in the day to go to Guanajuato to put the money in a bank."

Could that have been his object in delaying the conclusion of the negotiations?

And—"put the money in the vault over night."

What had these men said about that vault when I overheard them talking in their room at the Hotel Jardin?

"The vault has walls like fortifications," they had said.

"The money," they had added, "will be safer there than in any bank in Guanajuato."

And then they had all laughed, significantly. But, significant of what?

And now, who had Royal asked me if the money was safe—all of it—in the vault?

I tried in vain to make deductions that would strengthen the warning I meant to give the Don. Warning of what? Hang it! I never was good at solving puzzles.

"Don't worry," I said, having watched my opportunity to get a word with him after he finished giving orders to the servants about the danza "may I remind you that it would be a good thing to have the vault watched tonight—not by a servant, but by someone higher up. Three or four watchmen would be better."

"Thank you, my son, but it is not necessary," he said. "To break into that vault one would need an earthquake for a tool."

"What about nitroglycerine?"

He thought a moment, then exclaimed:

"Ah. Ildefonso!"

"Ildefonso!" I echoed, vaguely conscious of a feeling of uneasiness—apprehension—fear—what you will—at the sound of the name of the Don's private secretary.

"Is he returning from Mexico City?" I asked. "From the errand upon which you sent him?"

"So, Señor John. He should be here soon. And one watchman will be quite sufficient. It shall be Ildefonso."

Later when I dressed for the danza, I put the fifty bank-notes into my money belt, which I fastened about my body next to my skin.

CHAPTER XXX.

CHOOSING A PARTNER FOR THE DANZA.

At nine o'clock that evening I passed through the great patio on my way to the ballroom in the Administration building.

Around the vast courtyard now hung myriad lanterns, in the light of which hundreds of Aztecs of both sexes were dancing and holding high carnival to the music of the regimental band of the Black Cavalry.

Making my way by a zigzag course through the peon throng, I had progressed as far as the middle of the patio when suddenly I heard a voice directly behind me saying in English:

"You are in grave danger here tonight. Fly!—the moment the danza is over."

It was the voice of Meldrum, the Secret Service agent.

Swinging round and facing him, I beheld a tall, handsome Aztec, dressed like all the others in the patio, in gala attire. Meldrum certainly understood the art of make-up.

"No, no!" he expostulated now. "Turn away from me. Don't speak to me. Keep on walking."

I obeyed, and he followed close at my heels as he wound in and out between groups of peons.

"You will be implicated in the gang's plot—unless you fly," he said. "What gang?" I blurted.

"I warned you not to talk to me."

"What plot?" I again blurted, ignoring his plea for me to keep silent tongue.

"To rob the vault," he said, "of the million."

"Dios!" I exclaimed, turning around again despite his protests. "I suspected that. Why did they pay it—only to steal it?"

"They've got the title deeds," he exclaimed. "But keep on walking."

Again I turned my back, advanced again toward the ballroom.

"You were a fool to get your rope entangled with Royal's," he went on.

"But—damn it!" I cried, astounded at the inference conveyed in his remark. "I'm not one of the gang."

"Don't bother to explain—to a friend," he answered. "You can pull out with your skin if you'll heed what I say."

"But why don't you stop them?" I asked, protestingly.

"That's what I'm here for," he replied.

"I'll help you," I said.

"No you won't. You make your getaway. And before you leave, don't meddle in this job. Don't mention it to the family. Keep your hands off. This is the biggest game I have ever sat in—and I want to turn the trick unaided. You understand? I want the benefit of full credit at Washington. You make your getaway tonight directly after the concert throwing."

"Hanged if I will!" I announced. "I'll warn Don Justino, too."

"Not a word to the Don—unless you want to place him, and others, in extreme peril. Confound it! Don't worry about the Don. He will not lose a dollar. I'll be on watch in the Don's office at the door of the vault; I'll be the only watchman, too, for none other is necessary. Good-bye."

I again swung around to tell him he was mistaken about being the only watchman; but he had stepped into the middle of a group of Aztecs and now, with the majestic tread of those who walk in sandalled flatfootedness, he disappeared among the dancers. I knew I would have a hard time to distinguish him now from the genuine peons, and would, moreover, draw attention to him should I really succeed in finding him; so I let him go.

"Getaway!" I murmured. "No; not a step. I'll stay here—with my Felipe. Wonder if the Golden Senorita has arrived? And the stranger. They'll come out together, of course—in his motor-car."

I hurried on into the ballroom, where a scene met my eyes that was far more brilliant than I had dreamed of seeing at that remote hacienda in the mountains.

It cuts grease and dirt like magic, does away with scouring and scrubbing, and saves time and tempers.

Your servant can do more and better work and keep sweet with the aid of GOLD DUST in all household cleaning.
