MARRIED ROMANCE

When Eleanor Almstead entered her dining room that morning she thought she had everything necessary to make her perfectly happy. Her apartment was charming, just as she wanted it; she had everything necessary to make her happy and it was still delightfully new; she was healthy and she didn't look her thirty-four years, and she could not have had a finer husband than Glenn if she had had her pick of all the men in the world.

Glenn was reading the morning paper until she should come to pour his coffee. He was a big, handsome man with color and plenty of vitality and a genial manner, polished off by good breeding. Eleanor paused a moment in the doorway to contemplate him in the perfect setting of the cozy room. He smiled and held out his hand to her and Eleanor went to him swiftly, bent over him and kissed him.

"I see by the paper," he said, after he had filled his plate and tasted his coffee, "that Wallace Marshall is married."

"Wallace Marshall!" Eleanor exclaimed in surprise. "Whom has he married?"

"You'll be amazed when I tell you. She's the last person in the world you would ever guess. Margaret Hanover."

"Genn! You can't mean it! Why, she's three years older than Wallace and not especially good looking. What could he have seen in her?"

"He probably saw in her a good housekeeper and an intelligent companion," Glenn replied, smiling at her in amusement. "Marshall's no fool. He has been fished for until he probably knows all kind of bait. That is why he didn't take any one of the dozen girls he might have had and did take Margaret."

"Dear me!" Eleanor mused. She ate for a moment in silence. "But he must have loved her," she argued suddenly.

"Not necessarily, though undoubtedly he liked her. All men don't marry women merely for love."

"What then?" Eleanor demanded a little sharply.

"Why, I should say for the more important fact that they are likely to make good wives, and by good wives I mean, of course, wives who will be good housekeepers, reliable confidantes, wise companions. The man who marries simply for love doesn't get that kind of a wife; he gets a butterfly, with plenty of wing and color and mighty little intellect."

The color started to Eleanor's face and she bit her lips.

"As I am not a butt rdy," she said acridly, "you couldn't then have married me for love."

It came to her suddenly, poignantly, that Glenn's courtship had been a most philosophical, unimpassioned affair. They had rarely met when there had not been at least two or three people about. He had proposed and she had accepted him. Their exceedingly brief engagement had been filled with preparations for the wedding. At the time Eleanor had been too happy, too excited, to notice any lack of devotion in Glenn's manner, but now suddenly it occurred to her that as a husband he had proved himself far more satisfactory than as a lover. Across the table she caught and held his glance.

"Well, why don't you answer me?" she demanded.

He leaned toward her, gravely considering.

"Love isn't everything," he said. "Indeed, it is a very small part of what goes to make up a happy marriage. And ours is nappy, isn't it? But it wouldn't be without the accessories—without, for instance, this"—he indicated their surroundings.

"You wouldn't have married me, my dear, if I had been a common day laborer."

"So long as I loved you I would have."

"Pardon me—I doubt it. At any rate, I'd not have dared to ask you. Don't you see, dear? You happened to be the woman I had been looking for all my life. I could afford to have you and I tried my best to get you. I succeeded. I never stopped to think whether I loved you or not."

Eleanor, with gradually whitening cheeks, sat staring at her husband while she listened to the cold philosophy of his utterance. She was passionately in love with him and she had fondly expected him to be just as much in love with her. Her ideas were romantic. It seemed to her that she had been humiliated, cheated out of what was her due. She covered her face with her hands and began to cry bitterly.

"And I thought you loved me," she sobbed.

As he rose to come to her side, startled and aghast at the sight of her tears, she sprang out of her chair, and ran from the room to her own, and locked herself in, alone with her misery. Glenn followed presently, and tried the door handle and called to her. But she would not answer and he went to his downtown office.

Eleanor spent the morning in her room trying to get acquainted with the new face her life was showing her. She felt miserable and very sorry for herself, and presently she began to feel very angry with Glenn. She had a hot thought or two about leaving him, but she was, after all, too thoroughly bred to the conventions to do that. No, she must go on living with him, for the speech of For instance, some people were coming to dine tonight. They must not people and the sake of her friends. know. And, heroically resolved upon that point, Eleanor dressed and went to make ready for them. The dinner was a success and Eleanor exerted herself to be entertaining. Glenn seemed to feel that her stormy mood of the morning had passed, and that all he had to do was to overlook it completely. As for Eleanor, she did not again refer to the subject which had brought about so unhappy a revelation. But in her manner toward Glenn had sprung up a coolness, which admitted of no lovemaking on his part. Eleanor was supremely wretched within, whatever she appeared to be without. One day as she sat before her toilet table it came to her that she was looking very forlorn and faded. The encroaching ugliness scared her horribly.

"Heavens, how I look!" she thought. "No man's worth all this."

She got up and began to walk about the room.

"I'm a fool," she said aloud, fiercely. "I'm not reasonable in my love for Glenn. Next thing I'll lose my complexion and then likely I'll lose whatever liking he has for me. I've been thinking too much about him and too little about myself. Hereafter I'll think about myself. If I haven't actual happiness as I require it, I have all its externals, and I try as well make the best of them."

From that moment she began. It was at first difficult to feign an absorbing interest in such things as bridge, motors and frocks when what she really wanted was her husband's love, but Eleanor did it, and after a while the interest became a kind of habit which produced its own enjoyment. And anyway, it was something to be called the best hostess, the finest housekeeper and the most stunnily gowned woman in her set. As for Glenn, even Eleanor had to own that he became a more and more devoted husband.

"He finds me a satisfactory bargain evidently," she thought a little bitterly.

One night when she came from her room dressed for a box party she found him waiting with her opera cloak upon his arm. She went up to him and turned her shoulders to receive the cloak, but his arms as well as the garment went round her and with startling impulsiveness he kissed her neck.

"Why, Glenn," Eleanor exclaimed. "What made you do that?"

"Because I love you, dearest, and I want you to know it," he answered deeply.

"Love me!" Eleanor gasped. "But I thought—you said you didn't love me when you married me."

He drew a deep breath. "Possibly. But I love you now. Men do sometimes fall in love with their wives, you know."

He kissed her again and the kiss had a curious new flavor in it that set Eleanor a-thrill.

"Better late than never, eh?" he teased her tenderly.

Eleanor laughed joyously. "A great deal better," she agreed.
