SUCCESS

Mrs. Waltham revered success with the ardor of the one who has not met it. Success, for her, spelled so much more than the material things for which it stood. The story of one who has won against great odds, flushed her eager face and sent her hands clenching together. She felt the thrill of the victor hundreds of miles, perhaps, from the scene of the action.

It was hard, feeling as she did, to be married to a colorless little man, untalented and obscure, who never had, never would amount to anything. He did his duty with the unfailing exactitude of the stupid, to whom splendid mistakes were as unknown as splendid achievements.

Other people looked on her marriage as a singularly happy one. They envied conditions which she scorned. Sometimes they said pityingly:

"It's too bad the Walthams have no children; it would have been an ideal home for a child."

The words, after they were agreed to by the listener, were usually followed by:

"But what would you? One person can't have everything. I should think she would feel like throwing a ring into the sea, as it is."

Perhaps the hands of little children might have pulled the scales from the mother's eyes—might have made the desert of her life blossom as the rose. But they had never been given. There was not even a little grave to gaze back at. And at forty years she was a disappointed woman, with unfulfilled dreams looking darkly from her dark eyes.

There had been many opportunities for Amos Waltham to distinguish himself. There had been the Spanish war, with its exodus of brave men. Thrilled from her soul herself, she had waited for him to declare himself. But he watched with his kindly gray eyes, boys and men march away as if it were the most natural thing in the world to be an onlooker only. She waited an interminable time for him to propose going. At last she spoke, not altogether concealing the scorn that she felt.

"Why don't you go, Amos? If I were a man I'd be away before sunset."

And he had answered in his grave, abstracted fashion, not perceiving the contempt in her tone:

"Because, dear, I think I can be of more use where I am."

Afterward she found out some of the hundred little things he had done. As president of the small country bank he had been able to make loans to some of the destitute whose patriotic supporters were away in the field; he had broken bad news; he had delivered good news intact. He had kept an eye, by letter and influence, on many a mother's wild son, drunken with his first liberty. His wife heard of many things—not from him—without a spark of pride or approbation.

"All little things," she mused bitterly; "all little things, which a woman could have done as well as he."

In the course of time, when the war boys, chastened and out of health, returned, he busied himself finding a means of livelihood for them. The incident was closed. But his wife remembered, and some others.

His wife never forgot. She never could forget. She had grown to despise him and she showed it openly now. He mused over it at times, not bitterly, but as if it were something that could be explained if he had but the ability. And he showed her with the luxuries that the growing bank gave forth. She winced sometimes at the never ending gifts. He sighed sometimes that they were unavailing. They had everything and nothing. He was poorer than the poorest depositor in his bank.

The panic of 1907-1908 at first bid fair not to touch him. People had confidence in him in the stability of the old bank. It would weather the storm. And the run came without warning. The long line extended as far as eye could see one morning when he came down.

All that day they drew and drew and drew. He was glad when the hour of closing came. There was no harm done if there was no more of it—if the confidence of the people would hold for a few more days. He said nothing to his wife when he went home. Confidences had ceased between them and he would not burden her with the weight of care he carried. Perhaps there would be more of it, he thought with a sigh.

But in the morning the long, unbroken line still stood. He groaned as he heard the clink of passing coins. They were ruined, or nearly so. From time to time some clerk came to him, where he sat with his head on his hands, and told him how near the end was.

It was afternoon when the door opened softly again. He did not look up. The last messenger had told him that but a few hundred remained. This one would say that nothing did. But the messenger did not speak. He looked up into his wife's face, glowing with a light to which it had long been a stranger. She knelt down beside him and took his cold hands in her own.

"Amos—" she began.

He interrupted her.

"The house is gone; my insurance policy; every dollar I had. Still, like the horse leech's daughter, they cry, 'More! More!' I begged you unwillingly, but I had to do it."

She pressed his irresponsible hand. "Your good name above everything. We had to save your good name."

Even in this crisis, as near as it had drawn them, how different the view-point.

"No," he said, "not my good name but the confidence of the people who trusted me. I fought for them."

His wife fell to sobbing, her head against his knee.

"The bank is saved, Amos. The cashier says so. I threw my diamonds in the scale, and they turned it. We—it will be all right now."

"Then why do you cry?" his patient eyes questioned her.

She answered as if he had spoken.

"Oh, I'm crying, Amos, because it has taken me so long to see the success you've made of your life. The—putting others first—you know Amos. It is so rare. And perhaps that's why no wife was ever so proud before."

ACT OF COURTESY BRINGS A FORTUNE

Atlanta, Ga., July 20.—A courteous act of courtesy brought a fortune. When O'Neill exchanged a lower for an upper sleeper berth with J. T. Young of Oakland, Cal., four years ago, when the two men were enroute to Florida, where Mr. Young was going for his health, he thought little of the incident. Evidently Mr. Young considered it a great favor for in his will he left $28,000 to the Georgia young man who is 26 years old. O'Neill was in Atlanta yesterday and was informed of his good fortune by a son of Mr. Young, who had come to Georgia to look for him.

LEO'S ANNIVERSARY MASS

Rome, July 20.—The eighth anniversary of the death of Pope Leo XIII. was observed today with a requiem mass, which was celebrated at the Sacred College in the presence of the high dignitaries of the church and a number of invited guests.

INTERNATIONAL HIGHWAY STARTED

Plattsburg, N. Y., July 20.—Official representatives of the States of New York and Vermont and the Province of Quebec assembled today at Rouses Point, situated on the international boundary line near the foot of Lake Champlain, and joined in a celebration to mark the commencement of work on the proposed international highway to connect Montreal and New York City.

NEW YORK COUPLE TO CANOE TO CAMPOBELLO

(Canadian Press.)

Portland, Me., July 20.—Mr. and Mrs. H. Wiswood of New York, have just left Portland on a canoe trip to Campobello, N.B. It is to be the longest canoe voyage by salt water ever undertaken.

FRENCH LAKE

Mr. Harry Hood the contractor who built our new hall worked hard to have it in readiness for the 12th. He certainly deserves great praise as it is a beautiful building.

Sportsmen will not find it necessary to have a guide and go in deep foray this fall to shoot moose as they are plentiful about the lakes and are seen on the road going around the lake about every day.

Mr. Frank Foss of this place has built a store and house in Geary where he has moved and has opened an opposition business to Mr. Carr and Geo. Armstrong who gives you the most for your money. What is needed most is a first class Black Smith Shop.

Mrs. Till the widow is considering an offer of $600 for her farm.

Motor boats are numerous on the river towing lumber or taking pleasure parties up and down every day.

Mr. Frank Carr is suffering from a shock of which he is not expected to recover.

The San Jose, Calif., Labor Council is conducting an aggressive campaign to raise money for the erection of a labor temple.
