THE DOUBLE CROSS

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE STRANGER SAYS GOODBYE.

The car sped on toward Chepultepec and Alva gazed at me with a singularly concentrated look.

Sometimes I wondered what was in this woman's mind and heart—the woman who for ten years had understood that she was to marry the man now sitting beside her, only to find that he loved another.

"Two women, each bearing the sign of the cross," I murmured. "Yet I cannot doubt, Alva, that you are the one my father wished me to marry. But then, how does it happen that Felipa, too, has the cross?"

"You are betrothed to us both," she said. "And you have twenty-four hours more in which to make your choice?"

"Alva, you know the stranger. Who is he? For heaven's sake, give me some light."

"The moment you marry Felipa," she said, "you shall have the light—in full."

"But who is the stranger?" I persisted. "Why not tell me at least that?—right now."

"He is a very lonely man," she answered. "He loves a woman—God! how he loves her. He loves her enough to give her to another."

"You mean Felipa? He loves her enough to give her to me?"

"He holds some strange power over Felipa," I added. "Is it hypnotic?" "Ridiculous!" she said. "It is Felipa's power over him, not his over her."

"Her power over him?" I cried. "Yes! She controls him, makes him do whatever she wills."

"More mystery. I wish to Heaven, Alva, that I could marry Felipa to-night, instead of waiting till tomorrow, that I might know."

"The mystery of the twicrosses—the double cross?"

"No! The mystery of the stranger."

We had stopped now under the arch at the Alvarado Mansion.

Alva at once led the way to the dining-room.

"I am very tired," she said, "and so I will leave you to have supper with the stranger. He himself will bring you the application for the annulment of our marriage contract. But before you sign it, John—be sure you love Felipa."

"Do you love Felipa?" she demanded.

She trembled visibly as she asked the question, while at the same time she looked me straight in the eye.

"I love her," I said, "enough to give her up to the stranger—if she loves him. But she assures me that she loves only me and wishes me to take her away from that man."

"Good night, John."

She held out her hand. I took it and noticed tears in her eyes. But before I could ask what those tears meant, she snatched her hand away and fled from the room.

Servants began serving supper, but I waited for the stranger. He came in, presently, with his usual graceful bow and flash of white teeth.

He took his place at the table.

"I've been impersonating you to-night," I said. "I talked to Felipa—wearing your cloak and mask."

"Indeed," he said, and I could see that he was slightly startled by my news, but was doing his best to appear indifferent. "And what did Felipa say?" to the stranger.

"She requested," I said, "that he go away and leave her in peace."

"Her wish is already granted," was his prompt reply. "I am leaving the city tonight. And in a few days I leave Mexico altogether."

"You are going away!" I exclaimed, for now that I learned that he was going out of my life, I felt a kind of disappointment.

Despite everything, I liked this man. Nor could I account for my kindly feelings toward him.

"Alva says that there is one thing relating to myself which you would like to know—very much. What is it?"

For answer he produced the application for the annulment of the marriage contract between Alva and myself.

"But before you sign it, John," he said, rising and towering over me, "swear that you love Felipa."

"The fact that I sign this paper," I said, taking out my fountain pen, "is proof positive that I love Felipa—for the moment I sign this paper I know that I forfeit—"

"You certainly passed the test, John, satisfactorily."

"The test! Do you mean to say that all—I have seen and heard—was only a test, nothing more? Oh, yes! I recall now that Senor Reyes said my love would be put to a severe test."

"If you love Felipa," the stranger said, "enough to sign away your fortune, then sign that paper now."

"Then Felipa is not the true sign of the cross," I said. "Well, I don't care. I'd rather have Felipa than a dozen fortunes."

And I signed my name.

"Give it to Alva in the morning," he said. "Tell her to sign—right under your own signature. Then give the document to the Senor Reyes—who will then bring you the contract for you yourself to destroy, after he has had the matter expunged from the public records. Adios."

I stood up.

"Where are you going? Will you not tell me who you are before you go? Shall I see you again? Are you really the son of Leon Alvarado?"

"I am starting tonight on a long—a very long—journey," he answered, ignoring my question as to his identity. "Farewell."

"No, I will not say farewell. I swear to you that I will discover who you are, if it takes years. Alva knows you, Felipa knows you. Larry, Annalee knows you. One of these three will tell me—in the end."

"Your thirst for knowledge," he said in a sad voice, "will not be quenched. The three persons you mention will keep my secret. Remember me only as—the man of loneliness. Only one thing can call me back to Mexico, and that is if you or Felipa—get into trouble."

"Then," I said, "please don't go away, please don't start on your journey—till tomorrow night, after Felipa and I are married."

He thought a moment.

"You mean that you are in danger of being taken prisoner before I can help you. In that case, I could not help you. Felipa alone could help you, should you be taken prisoner. You have nothing to fear, except from the Aztecs, and your marriage to her will quiet them. However, for the present I am not going farther than Guanajuato. I will wait there at my bungalow until you and Felipa are married—until you hold her hand forevermore."

"NEW ORLEANS" AGAIN SAILS THE OHIO

Cincinnati, O., Nov. 3.—The people all along the Ohio River are on the lookout these days to see a little steamer puffing and wheezing its way down the stream. The little craft which looks strange to eyes accustomed to the large and imposing steamboats of the present day, is the replica of the steamer "New Orleans," the first steamer to make the trip down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. The original trip was made just one hundred years ago and marked the beginning of steam navigation on America's inland rivers. To commemorate the centenary of that event the replica was built and yesterday it started from Pittsburgh on a trip to New Orleans. The boat is due to reach Cincinnati Sunday and on the following day there will be a celebration in her honor. Similar celebrations will be held at points along the entire route under the auspices of the various State and local historical societies.

The original "New Orleans" called at first the "Enterprise" was built at Marietta and sent to Pittsburgh to be provided with engine and stern wheel of Robert Fulton's design. The little boat of some 350 tons cost $40,000 to build and left Pittsburgh on its trial trip October 11, 1811. Thereafter for three years it made regular trips between New Orleans and Natchez, until it was wrecked.

MISS MORGAN

MURCHES

Oct. 31.—George Reed of Eugene, Oregon, has been visiting his sister Mrs. John H. Murch of this place during last week, but left yesterday to spend a few days with his brother Benjamin. He says this part of the country looks more as he expected to find it, than any other place he has been in since he came back, he having worked a couple of summers in this neighborhood helping to build the late Geo. H. VanWart and William Slipp houses. He was then an apprentice with the late Jas. Mitchell of Scotch Settlement, learning the carpenter's trade. Then all trimmings, flooring, etc. was worked by hand and meant a day's work from sunrise to sunset and a person had to hustle at that.

Farmers are about all through gathering their crops, which have been as a general thing satisfactory except buckwheat and turnips which with some are only two-thirds of an average crop.

The people of this place were very much surprised to hear of Wm. H. Smith's death. Not many knew he was sick until they heard of his death and burial, he was a general favorite on both sides of the river here.

Miss Phoebe Gunter, who has been sick for some time was still alive this morning but not expected to live the day out.
