THE DOUBLE CROSS

"Only fountain!" I cried, trying to retain my composure under the sudden rush of thoughts that were rack- ing me. "What street?"

"Jesus del Monte."

My fork fell from my hand. I picked it up again and attacked a bit of chicken viciously.

No wonder Felipa had declined my company, when I offered to go with her to the "photographer's studio!"

She had gone straight to the abode of her lover. With my own eyes I had seen her enter that bungalow—in the street of Jesus del Monte.

I glanced at her now, dejectedly, in misery.

"You look, John," she said, "like Hamlet the melancholy."

"I sometimes think you are Ophelia the mad," I replied.

"Ophelia was a blonde," she retorted. "You are thinking of the Golden Senorita."

"That reminds me," I blurted, turning to Felipa's father. "Your daughter and I both saw the Senorita Alva in town this afternoon."

"That is strange," the Don replied. "Did not Diego say she left here?"

But he was interrupted by the impatient Felipa who shook my arm and cried:

"John, John! I did not see the Senorita Alva. I have never seen her in my life. Father, forgive him. It is his American humor."

I looked at Felipa in blank amazement. Another denial. It was apparent that she did not wish the others at the table to know she had seen the glorious Alva. Felipa's game was truly too deep for me.

After dinner I found myself alone with my betrothed a moment in the library.

"Felipa," I said, "why did you deny that you saw the Golden Senorita?"

"Because I did not see her," she persisted barefacedly. "Why do you say I saw her? I wish it were true."

"And your photographer," I observed, looking at her askance. "What an artistic bungalow! What a prosperous looking house—he lives in."

"Bungalow? Why, his office is in a 'dobe building' over a shop. What is in your mind?"

"Jesus del Monte."

"Oh! You are thinking of the street in which stands the house of the stranger. How queer you are! My photographer's studio fronts on the Alameda next door to the book-shop where you bought that novel for me."

"Felipa, did you not enter the bungalow behind the fountain—this afternoon after you left me?"

"After I left you?"

She laughed her clear, ringing, bell like laugh.

"You are as mad as Otto of Bavaria. What on earth is the matter with your brain tonight? Do you imply that you met me this afternoon? Where?"

"Felipa, my treasure, you would be worth your weight in gold to some government—at the court of the Czar. You are the mistress of intrigue itself. I suppose, then, you will deny you told me the Golden Senorita loves me? Why did you speak those ridiculous words?"

"Ah! I understand, John—at last. You think to amuse me with your American form of humor. Well, perhaps the Golden Senorita does love you, though last evening I used the word 'interested.' What, otherwise, could have induced her to appear to the Aztecs in the plaza at La Luz yesterday to accomplish, in the most direct way, the very end I sought by the roundabout method of breaking bread at the camp of the Black Cavalry?"

"How do you know that the woman of the plaza of La Luz was the Golden Senorita?"

"I divined it, John—as I divine that she loves you."

"Sheer nonsense! I've never spoken to that girl. And now, Felipa, look at me—straight in the eye. You deny that you visited the house of the stranger this afternoon?"

Gazing pointblank into my eyes, she replied:

"Not this afternoon—nor any other time."

I believed her, too. Those pure, clear, honest eyes ended my doubts and fears. That woman I had seen enter the stranger's bungalow, the woman wearing the white dress and having black hair, was not Felipa, of that I was now convinced. And I felt quite happy.

"Why do you persist," she said, "in asking such foolish questions—about the house of the stranger?"

"Divined it," I replied, smiling, "as I divined that he loves you."

"Sheer nonsense," she retorted, laughing. "I have never spoken to that man."

"But," she went on, "we must start for the theatre. My cloak—throw it around me, please."

Here was my opportunity to act the part of the bandit. I caught up her opera cape, threw it over her left shoulder, let it hang there while both my hands went swiftly to her right arm to unhook—tear away, if necessary—the three bands of black velvet.

Quicker than I, however, she snatched her arm away, turned upon me, saying:

"John, look at me—straight in the eye. Do you deny that you promised never again to do that? John! I divine—that I shall have to take care not to be alone with you whenever I wear a gown like this."

"Oh, Senora," turning to del Treveno's wife, who had just entered the room, "are not the Americanos very strange creatures? They think that a woman's cloak should hang from the left shoulder like a peon's zarape. Look at me! The Senor John has made me—cross."

"I have seen no—sign of it," I said.

"Wait till we are—married," she retorted, "and you will."

IN MEMORY OF CIVIL WAR OFFICER

Lenanon, Ind., Sept. 21—A monument to the memory of Colonel A. C. Miller was dedicated with interesting exercises here today in connection with the annual reunion of the Wilder brigade. Colonel Miller, whose home was in Lebanon, was commander of the seventy-second Indiana regiment, which formed part of the Wilder brigade.

Give your servants GOLD DUST to clean with, treat them rightly and you will have few occasions to insert a "help wanted" ad

They say a good work man is known by his tools. You cannot expect your maid to keep everything ship-shape unless you give her every modern help. To keep house without GOLD DUST is to do work by hard, old-fashioned methods. For cleaning everything and anything about the house—from cellar to attic—GOLD DUST is worth its weight in gold. It cuts grease and dirt like magic, does away with scouring and scrubbing, and saves time and tempers.

Your servant can do more and better work and keep sweet with the aid of GOLD DUST in all household cleaning.
