The Gold Dust Twins' Philosophy

THE floors and doors appear to wait until the dust germs congregate; the housewife hails each dawning day with grim and harrowing dismay. Says she: "My work will NEVER end; o'er dusty stretches I must bend, until, with aching back and hands I finish what the day demands."

The "Floor-and-Door-a" Girl

work and the endless doors, until when Hubby saw them, too, reflections said: "Why, howdy-do!"

"The Gold Dust Twins," said she, "I find, help leave the woes of dust behind. Each mark of sticky hands on doors, each tread of muddy feet on floors, all fade before the slightest touch of Gold Dust, and the work is such that, when the woodwork has been done, I find said work was only fun." This line of reasoning must show that those who've tried it OUGHT to know. If you, in one day's duties, find that there's a Grouch in every Grind, invite the Gold Dust Twins to share such tasks as tire and fret and wear.

From kitchen floor to bedroom suite, these tireless little chaps make neat, and best of all, the sum expense is measured up in meager cents. They put both dust and dirt to rout and run the last old microbe out.

AN EXCITING PRESENT-DAY ROMANCE

WEATHERBY CHESNEY

"No, sennor, not well enough for that. When he came to my house first he knew only his own English tongue, and Spanish, which he said he had learned to help him in his business in London. But a Portuguese can understand Spanish if it is spoken slowly, and can make himself understood in return, so we were able to converse. The Sennor Bernardo is clever, however, and very soon he was able to speak Portuguese without making it sound like Spanish; but no, not as well as a native of the islands."

Scarborough nodded, and then held out his hand.

"Many thanks for your courtesy, Sennor padrao," he said. "You have helped me more than you know, and I hope you will get your money."

The man bowed, with the natural politeness which is instinctive with the islanders of the Azores in all ranks of life.

"I am happy to have been of service," he said. "If the sennor finds Sennor Bernardo, perhaps, in the course of conversation on more important things, he will remind him that my bill is still unpaid."

"I will if I get the chance," said Scarborough, laughing.

When they were in the street again, and on their way back to Monagu's house, Scarborough said to Varney:

"Now, Phil, you don't understand the lingo, so I shall have to tell you what the padrao and I were talking about. But first—where did you see Gillies?"

"In the geyser country, near Furnas," said Varney.

"How and when?"

"The day before yesterday. I was there with Muriel and her father."

He went on to explain that Davis and his daughter had taken him to see the geysers of Furnas, which make one of the show places of the island of San Miguel. They had taken food with them, and made a day of it, and it was while they were lunching under a tree by the roadside that Gillies had passed.

He was riding a donkey in the universal fashion of the islands, perched sideways, and holding on to the cross bars of a great wooden framed saddle, which rested on two straw pads.

He was dressed like a peasant of the country, in a blue blouse and tight trousers; and, with a maize husk cigarette between his lips, and a pillow covered with a piece of bright carpet under him for a seat, he looked the part to perfection. Davis hailed him with a "Viva!" as he passed, and was answered with a surly "Bonas dias, sennor."

But there was something in the accent with which the words were spoken that made the pine grower say suddenly:

"That man isn't what he pretends to be. I'm going to speak to him. I'm interested in human curiosities."

He got up and followed the man, and was away for about half an hour. When he returned he told them with great glee that he had met a real original.

"I thought the fellow wasn't an Azorean," he said. "He's a Scotchman, though what he's doing masquerading in that get-up, I can't imagine."

If he were an American or a journalist I should say he was studying the habits of the people with a view to writing a book, and had adopted native costume, and ways so as to get a closer view; but I don't think he's either. What do you think he and I have been talking about?"

"The crops or the weather, or the awful expense of foreign travel," as he is a Scot," said Varney.

"The frivolity of women if my father chose the subject," said Muriel.

"Neither. We discussed apostolic succession, and he claims that the Scotch Kirk has got it through saint Johnnie Knox, as he called him. I haven't spent such an interesting half-hour for a long time."

Later in the day they came across the man again in the village of Furnas. His donkey was waiting for him outside the door of the inn, and he himself was inside having a meal.

Davis left the other two to amuse themselves by wondering about the village, whilst he went in to continue the discussion on apostolic succession with the man who had interested him so much.

"Now," said Varney, when he had come to this point, "he's our man, isn't he? It was your saying to Miss Carrington that perhaps you would discuss John Knox with him that made me remember him. He's hunting for the diamonds, and he's doing it on a donkey, because he looks like an Azorean naturally, and every second Azorean peasant you meet is riding one. What did you find out in the venta?"

Scarborough told him, and at the end Varney said:

"Well, if Carrington's enemy who is well known to me, the hooded woman, the man in the boat, Mrs. Carrington's burglar, and Andrew Gillies, are one and the same person, he's a pretty lively fighter. But will the dates fit?"

"Yes," said Scarborough. "You met him the day before yesterday, the Ring-Rock business was yesterday, and the theft of the letter was this morning. But if he did get about the island like that, I don't see where we are to put our hands on his shoulder, as you said."

"In the Furnas district," said Varney. "He'll go back there."

"Why?"

"Because, for some reason, that's where he thinks the stones are, or he wouldn't be pottering about there on his donkey. That was where Monty Carrington, you remember, so it's a likely enough place. But as Gillies has that letter now, we shall have to be energetic. Are you on duty to-night?"

"Yes, from midnight till eight."

"Then I shall have to take first watch in the country. I'll go and have supper at the Casa Davis, strap a sleeping bag on my handle-bars, and ride on afterwards to Furnas. It will be no hardship to spend a night in the open in this weather."

"But why not go to the inn?"

"Better not. Gillies might be there, and there's no need to alarm him. If he knows where to look for the diamonds we had better let him do it, and watch for him in the process. I'll camp out. I know the very place—a stack of maize cobs on the hill-side, from which there is a wide prospect. Muriel and I sat there for an hour. I know the trick of waking at daylight, so if Gillies and his donkey are in evidence in the morning, I shall be ready for them."

"Right," said Scarborough cheerfully. "I'll ride over and join you after breakfast. I'm on duty for the next week, so I shall be able to take the day watches, if you will do the nights. It won't matter about my being sleepy in the instrument room; there's not often much coming through, and if a busy spell did come, the other man would wake me. How about you, though?"

"Oh, I shall be all right," said Varney. "I'll start now, and you had better go back to the Chinelas and see that the girls are all right. I suppose Mona will stay the night there. We'll tell Montague that she won't return to-night, or he'll fidget. Better tell her, when you see her, to keep her eye on Mrs. Carrington, and if she sees anything suspicious, she should send a message to you. And there's another thing: when you ride over to join me to-morrow, bring the scratched stone with you, and stop at the Casa Davis on the way. Davis knows the island very well, and he may be able to make a shot at the meaning of a blue—n. drip."

"Right," said Scarborough. "I will. Then, I'll be off. T-t-t, old man; and keep your eyes on Mrs. Carrington. We've rather left her out of the reckoning, but she's a factor that will have to be counted. Don't let her steal a march on you."

Scarborough smiled. He did not think that Mrs. Carrington was likely to be very dangerous now. By allowing her husband's letter to be stolen from her, she had let the best card in the whole game slip out of her hands, and he therefore rather despised her pervers as a fighter.

His judgment in the matter was premature. He was to learn shortly that Rachel Carrington was most of all to be feared at that moment, when to others it appeared that she was wholly out of the game.

CHAPTER XX.

An Eavesdropper

It was nearly nine o'clock when Scarborough rode up the gravel path to the door of the Chinelas again. He had been on duty from seven till ten that morning; then had come the message from Elsa, the ride with her into Ponta Delgada, the visit to the venta in the north road, and the ride back; he had had a tiring day already, and he was due for duty again at midnight. But he hardly knew that he was tired. The joy of at last doing something, the knowledge that Elsa was now co-operating with him in the fight, instead of tacitly putting obstacles in his way, the hope that now the misunderstanding between them was at an end, a closer understanding would follow in its place, when he had put to her the question he was hounding to put—these things had been tonic, and would have been enough to counterbalance the fatigue of even greater exertions.

He hoped to be able to get an hour's sleep yet, before he had to begin his watch in the instrument room; but first, as Varney had said, he must see that the girls were all right.

He found them together in the drawing-room and it seemed to him that Elsa's stiffness with the other girl had worn off considerably since the afternoon. Had anything happened to bring them closer together? Or was it simply that Mona's sunny nature had melted a coldness that was mainly artificial, and her persistent offer of friendship had broken down the barrier which Elsa's sensitive fancy had set up?

Scarborough, seeing them, sitting together, in outward amity at least, had the thought borne in upon him irresistibly that they were surely and obviously meant to be friends. The very difference in the types of their beauty made them such admirable foils to each other—Elsa's delicate, dainty beauty of arched eyebrows, Mona's vivacity of flashing, bright eyes, black hair, and an anemone of the woods, fragile but exquisite; the other a rich blossom of the sunlight.

"Mother has gone to bed with a headache," said Elsa, "and Mona is going to stay with me for the night."

PERSISTENCY IN ADVERTISING

re stroke of a bell in a thick fog does not give a lasting impression of its location, but when followed by repeated strokes at regular strokes at regular intervals the densest fog, the darkest night can not long conceal its whereabouts. Likewise a single insertion of an advertisement—as compared with regular and systematic ADVERTISING—is in its effect not unlike a sound which, heard but faintly once is lost in space and soon forgotten.
