THE HORRORS OF WAR

"An officer of the French army" is writing a very interesting series of letters from the firing line, which appear in The Scientific American. In the course of that letter he points out that this is a very dangerous season from a health standpoint for the troops at the front. Pleurisy and bronchitis lurk in every rain storm and are as fatal as the thrusts of a bayonet. He says:

"Today they are cleaning up the battlefield. The corpses have been picked up and placed in a row, while the men, their nostrils plugged with cotton saturated with a disinfectant, are digging the ditches to receive the dead. The Germans, when they do not inter their dead in trenches, pile them in a heap, cover them with straw, pour kerosene on them and burn them. A terrible odor, an odor of decayed meat, mounts from all this putrefaction. It grips our throat and for days it sticks to us. While I am writing these lines I smell it still thick around me. In vain the wind blowing in gusts across the plain, tries to sweep it all away. It succeeds in dissipating the swirls of the smoke which rise from all the burning stakes, but it cannot drive away the odor of death."

Then again, in describing the scene left after a German retreat, and as evidence of the fighting, he writes:

"A taube aeroplane pierced with shells and shrapnel fell on the left of the road; nothing remains but the frame. Dead horses, swollen and hideous to look at, are scattered about the roads of the retreat, which are still littered with straw taken from the neighboring fields and upon which the exhausted troops of the enemy had rested a few hours."

And then he draws aside the curtain which depicts the glory of war and further proceeds:

"In a barn a Saxon ambulance is put up. Twenty or twenty-five Germans are gasping in death throes on miserable pallets. Two army surgeons are dressing their wounds. One of the Saxons is naked and kneeling. The surgeon is sawing up his back, baring pieces of his flesh. Speechless and coldly, I looked upon this horrid spectacle."

And then comes revelation of "the culture" which dominates the German army. He proceeds:

"A more appalling sight is that of the abandoned dead left without burial and that of the wounded lying helpless on the roadside and in the ditches. * * * Night has fallen and with it silence. An odor of blood, of fire and of death hovers now upon the darkened fields."

The Emperor William finds this awful odor from the battle-field, like the savor of sweet incense in his nostrils as he blasphemously ascribes the glory of such a victory to the Almighty!

THE SPIRIT OF VICTORY

The Roman Review, an Italian publication, has the following to say in regard to the visit of Kitchener to Paris following the retreat of the allied army from Mons:

"The British are a people splendidly disciplined. Not a complaint was heard when it appeared manifest that the British remained alone, from Mons to the Marne, to fight the battle for France. There were no public recriminations nor journalistic lamentations. Lord Kitchener went to Paris in strict incognito, and his interference lost nothing of its potency on this account. The Minister Messimy received his conge. General Pau was called on to do a work of a very different urgency than that of sentimental wanderings in Alsace; a greater harmony between the authorities, a closer co-operation between the allied troops, was assured, and the heroic British army corps were flanked by soldiers of the first order. A new spirit was infused into the French army, discouraged by the timid attitude of the reserves who, by a great mistake, had been sent to sustain the first shock of the enemy; and the spirit infused was the spirit of victory. This is the secret history of the campaign, which no English news paper has revealed."

London Chronicle—George Stevens' impression of the Kaiser is worth recalling now. He saw him riding through cheering crowds in Berlin on the day of the great autumn parade—a face at once repulsive and and pathetic, so harsh and stony was it, so grimly solemn. A face in which no individual feature was very dark, but which altogether was black as thunder. He raised his gloved hand in a stiff mechanical salute, and turned his head impassively from left to right; but there was no courtesy in the salute, no light in the eye, no smile on the tight mouth for his loyal subjects. He looked like a man without joy, without love, without pity, without hope. He looked like a man who had never laughed, like a man who could never sleep. A man might wear such a face who felt himself slowly turning into ice."

ON THE SIDE

The English sleight-of-hand performers that pulled the Belgian hare out of the hat found it was a bulldog.

Mr. Edison expects to make the submarine safer. But they seem to be already entirely too safe for battleships.

The German culture may not "take" in Belgium, but it has left considerable vaccination scar.

Gen. von Moltke, German chief of staff, is reported to be recovering from liver trouble. But the bulk of Europe remains bilious.

Marconi says he will be able to throw the human voice across the ocean by means of wireless. Hands across the sea will soon be superseded.

"Co-ed" at a Western university spends forty cents a year for the support of missions and $110 a year for "society and moving pictures." That statement needn't tax anybody's credulity.

Considered in his domestic relations, the Kaiser is admirable. Unfortunately for the Kaiser, only a very few can know him in that way. The whole world can see him, for instance in his relation to the Belgians.

THE REDEMPTION OF DAVID CORSON.

On Monday and Tuesday of next week the Gaiety Theatre will present the famous Player feature "The Redemption of David Corson," in four acts, with William Farnum the distinguished American actor in the title role. This is the first time that this well known and popular novel which was written by Charles Fredk. Goss, has been put into motion picture form, and from the favorable comment upon this fine story, which tells of a man's regeneration there is little doubt that this attraction will come fully up to expectations when it is presented at the Gaiety Theatre on Monday. Ladies and children should take advantage of the daily matinees which start at 3 o'clock, to avoid standing and long waits.
