AN EXCITING PRESENT-DAY ROMANCE

—BY—

WEATHERBY CHESNEY

Supplied Exclusively in Canada by The British & Colonial Press Service, Limited.

Scarborough noted with pleasure that she said Mona, and not Miss Ryan or Miss de la Mar.

"What has happened?" he asked, smiling.

Mona caught his meaning at once.

"Oh," she said, "we've been through a battle together since we saw you. We went into it Miss Carrington and Miss Ryan, and we came out of it Elsa and Mona. Are you pleased?"

"Very," he answered. "But against whom was the battle? Not against each other?"

"No," said Elsa, "against mother."

"That is why she has gone to bed with a headache," said Mona laughing.

"It was a hot engagement, you know, and she was utterly routed. She objected to my presence in the house, and Elsa stuck up boldly for me, and for the rites of hospitality, and said I should stay. Mrs. Carrington retorted that I shouldn't, and they fought it out, and that pale fragile little girl there scored a complete victory."

"Did you sit quietly by and listen?" asked Scarborough with a smile.

"Five pounds to no hing you didn't."

"Oh, I chipped in with a remark or two towards the end," said Mona gaily.

"I couldn't resist it, you know. But Elsa bore the real brunt of the battle; mine was only a cavalry pursuit at the finish, to cut up the disorganized forces of the enemy, and drive the victory home."

"I think Mrs. Carrington's headache is probably rather bad. At least that is the only reason I can think of to explain why she made the mistake of losing her temper and blurt out something that we very much wanted to know."

"She told you what was in the letter that was stolen?" cried Scarborough eagerly.

"She admitted that it contained a plan of the place where the diamonds are hidden," said Mona, "and she seemed to think that it was Elsa's fault that it had been stolen. I didn't follow her reasoning there, and I took the liberty of pointing out some of her mistakes. In the first place I reminded her that she went to an hotel, instead of coming straight home; secondly, she put the plan in her purse instead of handing it over with her other valuables to the cashier to keep; thirdly, she had a large cup of coffee sent up to her the last thing at night, and I suspected that someone had been paid to put an opiate into it, until she awoke next morning about eleven to find that the plan was gone."

"Of course the man in the small boat had shadowed her from the Ring-Rock, and by sleeping in the hotel she gave him his chance. After all that, instead of abusing herself for her folly, she abuses Elsa. The unreasonableness of this was also one of the things I took the liberty of pointing out to her."

"On what grounds does she blame you?" Scarborough asked Elsa.

"Because I hid that stone jar at the Ring-Rock at all," said Elsa. "But never mind that. We found out from her that the plan was not complete, because it gave no indication of where the place to which it referred was to be found. Father said he dared not put that information in the letter, because it might get into the wrong hands, but that he would convey the knowledge to her in some other way. She believes that I have that knowledge, and that I am keeping it back from her purposely."

"Well, so you are," said Scarborough, smiling.

Elsa sprang to her feet. "The scratched stone!" she exclaimed. "Blue—N. drip!"

"Exactly," said Scarborough. "By the way, that look of yours hadn't been tampered with?"

"No."

"Good. Will you give me the stone to keep for you?"

Elsa unlocked the desk and took the stone out. "But after all, it's unintelligible," she said. "What does 'blue—N. drip' mean?"

"I haven't an idea," said Scarborough. "But it we had the full text, including the words that that idiot of a bean-seller rubbed out with his blotter, I haven't a doubt but that it would prove to be the message that Mrs. Carrington wants."

"Well, now," said Mona approvingly. "I think that's sense, and I'm surprised Elsa and I didn't think of it. Do you know it seems to me rather a pretty situation. The man who stole the plan won't be able to use it, because he hasn't the scratched stone; we have the scratched stone, but it's no use to us because we can't interpret it without the plan; and your mother, Elsa, has lost the plan, and never heard of the scratched stone. It rather looks as though the diamonds stood a good chance of staying undisturbed where they are for a year or two. You and I needn't have bothered about deciding what we were going to do with them when we got them!"

"Have you been doing that?" Scarborough asked with some amusement.

"Oh, yes, we've settled it all! There were rather a lot of people who suffered in the Carrington and Varney smash, you know, and most of them were poor. We had decided that the diamonds should be sent to the liquidator in bankruptcy, to be turned into a small dividend of something or other in the pound."

"She resigns all her own claim," said Elsa to Scarborough. "Isn't it splendid of her? She says that the poor people suffered more than she did."

"Oh, no, it isn't splendid, or heroic or anything of the sort," Mona cut in before Scarborough could answer. "I don't run away with that idea, Elsa. I've got two reasons, both are very ordinary ones. The first is that I've got a feeling that I should have a touch of some of the money."

man who stole it from me lost his life in defending. That's silly perhaps, but I can't help it. The second is that I don't need it."

"Not just now," said Scarborough. "But if you grow tired of your wandering life with the circus-troupe—"

"Oh, do I bother!" said Mona. "I've got plenty of money, I tell you; but it's a theme I don't want to discuss just now. I have a reason for that, too, which I shall perhaps tell you some day, and perhaps not. It all depends upon whether something I very much want to happen, does happen. See?"

The others noted with astonishment that she was blushing, and Elsa began:

"Why, Mona—"

"Change the subject, please!" said Mona with a laugh. "Mr. Scarborough, you haven't reported what you and Phil found at the venta."

Scarborough told them the result of the visit to the venta, and of Varney's suggestion that the Furnas district should be watched night and day, in order to catch the man Gillies. Of course Gillies knew nothing about the scratched stone, and if it was he who had stolen the plan from Mrs. Carrington, there was still that link missing in his knowledge; but it was also possible that he had other reasons for knowing, or guessing, the place to which the plan referred, and so could do without the stone. Anyway Varney was quite right in saying that he must be watched."

"You are going to ride over and relieve Phil in the morning?" Mona asked.

"Yes."

"I can improve on that plan. Elsa and I will go with you, and we'll call on the way for Miss Davis. We will make a regular picnic of it."

Scarborough shook his head. "Too conspicuous," he said. "We shall frighten our man if we go in a swarm. Phil suggests, and I think he's right, that as Gillies seems to know more than we do, we should let him go ahead without interference for the present, and bide his time in the last minute. So you see, we ought to frighten him yet."

"Exactly," said Mona. "But that's just what I meant by suggesting a picnic. If he sees you and Phil mooning about here, he'll know that you are watching him; and you may be sure he will see you. But if we all go, he'll think it's just a picnic party, and we shall be able to explore the whole neighborhood without exciting his or anybody else's suspicions."
