CARUSO SAYS $3,000 A NIGHT IS NEWS TO HIM

(New York Sun.)

Signor Caruso's denial today that he is to receive $3,000 a performance at the Metropolitan season after next has caused much comment as to the high salaries paid opera singers. New York is naturally interested in these salaries, since it pays the highest in the world except our South American neighbor, Buenos Ayres.

Caruso said the report was news to him. And he grinned as if it would have been good news if it had happened to be true.

It is usually said that Caruso now received $2,500 for each performance. As a matter of fact, he is singing under a cumulative contract, with an increase of $100 a night each year. That means that he receives a $2,400 rate this year and a $2,500 one next year.

The last time Caruso signed a contract at the Metropolitan his salary was jumped to $2,000 and it has been increasing steadily ever since. This greatest of living tenors was first engaged by Maurice Grau at an even $1,000 but Grau retired before Caruso came to America and the golden inheritance of his singing fell to Conried.

It is interesting to note that Enrico Caruso has never sung but once in a popular Saturday night opera. This was on April 4, 1908, the last night of Conried's career as the Metropolitan Opera impresario. It was Herr Conried's idea to give a gift to the people on the closing night and he had Caruso sing in "Il Trovatore" an opera in which he rarely appears.

Geraldine Farrar, who, next to Caruso, is the biggest "drawing card" at the Metropolitan, is naturally the highest paid of the women singers. It is said that she received $1,250 for each performance. Emmy Destinn also receives close to that figure, while Olive Fremstad, who sang at The Evening Sun's Carnival of Music in the Madison Square Garden, and Johanna Gadske each receives, it is said, $1,000 from the Metropolitan.

When Luis Tetrazzini, with her upper register of high notes, was singing at the Metropolitan, she received $1,800 a performance, which was $300 more a night than she received when she was singing at the Manhattan Opera House. Mary Garden, in the Manhattan Opera days, received, it is said, $1,400, although rumor has it that she is doing better now in Chicago. Renaud and Sammarco received $1,100 for each performance, while Dalmore was given $600 for each night he sang.

In the earliest days of the Manhattan-Metropolitan opera war Oscar Hammerstein went over to Paris and hunted up Maurice Grau, who was living there in retirement.

"What can I do, Mr. Grau, to go ahead of the Metropolitan?" he asked.

"Hire Caruso at $5,000 a performance," was the reply.

This, by the way, was the figure that it cost William Waldorf Astor to have Caruso sing at his London residence. Astor also paid that amount to have Paderewski play at a concert given in his home.

With regret Hammerstein informed Grau that he could not afford to hire Caruso at that figure.

"Well, then," said Grau, "get Melba to sing at the Manhattan."

So Hammerstein said that he would try and crossed the British Channel in the next boat. He found Nellie Melba in London and asked her terms. Mme. Melba had no Metropolitan contract that season and felt inclined to be obliging.

"I will sing ten times at the Manhattan," she said, "for $30,000."

Hammerstein was a little taken aback but still game. He asked permission to walk around the block before he decided. By the time he had finished his walk he had made up his mind to engage Mme. Melba. He never regretted the decision for it was Melba who made his first season of opera a success.

One of the greatest money makers of operatic history is Adelina Patti, who could sing "Home, Sweet Home" and other things in a way to draw tears from one's eyes. The fortune which she accumulated from her operatic and concert career is estimated at $4,000,000. She made her operatic debut as Lucia in the New York Academy of Music November 24, 1895. Although previous to 1869 her earnings never exceeded $600 a night later on, when Mme. Nilsson was engaged at $1,000, Patti got $1,050.

Caruso's contract calls for forty performances during the season, which nets him close on to $100,000. This is not so bad, considering that Caruso started his career at Sorrento, Italy, and was paid only $15 a night. But he discovered that a rival tenor was getting three times his price and in a rage fled from Sorrento. A Leghorn opera house manager grabbed him at $150 a performance, a neat jump of 1,000 per cent. His fame spread through Italy and by the time Maurice Grau nabbed him Caruso was able to demand and get $1,000 a night and it should not be forgotten that Caruso doubles his income by getting a royalty on his records from a talking machine company of 10 cents each. As his records are the best sellers, even at high prices, it is assured that Caruso makes $100,000 a year from his royalties.

of Carleton and Queen streets at the first of the week but will not have their handsome oak counters and other fittings in position till May 1. The furniture is very fine and the bank will have magnificent offices.

SCOTT ACT—The principal topic discussed during the week has been the Scott Act trials, the first shot in which was fired Saturday afternoon, when William Bragdon, a so-called detective, appeared at the police court in a trial on the complaint of Miss Jessie Hooper against the Queen Hotel. J. W. McCready appeared for the prosecution and J. W. VanWart, Q.C., for the defence. Bragdon is the principal witness in fifteen cases to be tried soon.
