THE PROFITABLE FARM

Soll Must be Enriched to Same Extent at Least as it Yields

The basis of successful and profitable farming is a fertile soil. Nature's way is to return to the soil just as much as is taken from the soil. The leaves of the forest trees fall to the ground immediately beneath, carrying back the fertility extracted through the roots. The grasses of the prairie rot back each year, and the rich prairie soil is the result.

The pioneer refused to learn from nature. He took liberally from the bounty of the earth, but returned nothing. At first he harvested splendid crops. Ultimately nature shut down on him, and to-day we find ourselves obliged to return to a nature's ways in our treatment of the land. First, and above all things, we must maintain the fertility of our soil. The dairy farm on which the crops raised are consumed on the farm and returned to the soil, is going a long way towards maintaining the balance of fertility. The dairyman who buys concentrated feeding stuffs in addition for the feeding of his herd, may actually enrich the soil.—Farm and Dairy.

Muskrat Farming

Muskrat farming has proven to be a profitable business in the United States. Large areas of marsh land. In Ohio and Maryland are made to yield good returns through the production of muskrat fur. Indeed it has been stated by competent authorities that many of these marsh lands are worth more, measured by the actual income from them, than cultivated farms of like acreage in the same vicinity. Owners of such marsh lands usually lease the trapping privilege, uniting with the trappers to prevent poaching. The returns from the sale of the muskrat fur are divided equally between the owner and the trapper; the latter securing whatever extra he can from the sale of the flesh.

What Becomes of Smoke?

Smoke is composed of gases and of little particles of fuel which are carried up the chimney by suction. Knowing this, the ultimate end of smoke may be readily explained. The fuel particles fall to the ground of their own weight when they get beyond the drawing power of the chimney and out of the current of the heated air formed in the chimney flue.

There is a lot of carbonic acid gas in smoke which mixes with the air, and eventually becomes food for plants. Some other gases which are not entirely consumed when they come from the chimney, are burned by the air still more until they, too, become carbonic acid gas.

What Makes Us Yawn?

Yawning is so commonly associated with seeing some one else yawn that many think it is infectious. But it is no more infectious than many other habits we acquire by imitating others, and which are due to suggestion.

We yawn because of the need of sending enough good air into the lungs for purifying the blood. It is nature's way of making us take an uncommonly deep breath of air in at one time.

The lack of sufficient good air in the lungs may not be due to the poor breathing, out to the amount of bad in the room.

When one person yawns under such conditions it is quite likely that other people in the room will yawn because they all begin to feel the need of more good air at about the same time.

Photographing Oneself

Take a wood spring clothespin and shape out one end so that it grasps the bulb of the shutter and the spring tends to press on the bulb.

Then the other ends are brought together so as to release the bulb, and are tied with string or thread. On this is put a piece of fuse of some length.

Lighting the fuse, the person goes to the distant point before the camera, and when the string is burned the clothespin presses the bulb and makes the exposure.

T. P. O'CONNOR PRAISES BRAVERY OF CANADIANS

The Splendid Work at Ypres Has Given Them Great Privilege in the Old Country—A Great Bond Sealed in Blood Between the Motherland and The Dominion

(Copyright, 1915, Central News, by T. P. O'Connor.)

London, May 1.—The end of the week finds London cool and even sanguine, although it began rather gloomily in the face of the undoubted, though small, gains made by the Germans in the vicinity of Ypres. Those on the inside seemed, throughout the week, quite easy over the trend of events; first, because of the knowledge that the British had several other lines of defence, behind those won by the Germans and they never contemplated the smallest possibility of the Germans breaking through; second, they fully expected the French and English advance more than to offset the German success.

BRAVERY OF CANADIANS.

However, the fact that is attracting the most attention is the conspicuous bravery disclosed by the Canadians. This has given the Canadian troops the greatest prestige and their victory is regarded by everybody as evidencing a great new bond, sealed in blood, between the motherland and the dominion.

It is again necessary to record the growing bitterness against the Germans. This is partly due to the ugly revelations concerning the treatment accorded British prisoners and to the use by the Germans of asphyxiating bombs. The universal determination not to end the war until Prussian militarism is crushed is enormously increased by the universal conviction that Prussia respects no law of civilized warfare.

MISSION TO FRANCE.

Our mission to Paris, on which I left London Thursday morning, arose from a desire to demonstrate Ireland's solidarity with the Allies in their determination to save France from destruction and to vindicate her own principal of nationality by helping to liberate Alsace and Lorraine. It was felt that the mischievous and mendacious suggestion of violent anti-clerical legislation on the part of the present French government which was keeping the French population divided into two great sections should have an authoritative denial. To this end the Ancient Order of Hibernians, one of the most powerful and oldest of the Irish Catholic societies, resolved to present an address to the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris. The latter gladly accepted the suggestion and took full advantage of the opportunity to bring out the fact already known to all the world that thousand of French priests are bravely fighting in the trenches for the defence of France. Frenchmen today, of all religions, have suspended their differences to preserve France from ceasing to exist for either Catholic or Free Thinker, or those of other beliefs.

SYMPATHY WITH FRANCE.

Those who heard the mission offered our delegation the honor of a ceremonial reception by President Poincaré. Raymond, who, despite the most cordial invitation was unable to attend owing to the importance of the proceedings in the House of Commons, asked me to address a few words to the President, voicing Ireland's universal sympathy with France in her present trouble and our determination to support her by every means in our power. This was immediately followed by an invitation to the members of the mission from both chambers of the French parliament to attend a banquet, an almost unprecedented honor. The foreign affairs committee nominated Bourgeois to preside at the function.

It was evident before the delegation left London that it would be welcomed enthusiastically by France, which would extend every form of hospitality and honor. The deputation consisted partly of members of the Hibernian society, including Devlin and President Nugent. The address, which presented in glowing terms the affection of Ireland for France, will be preserved in the archbishopric archives. The reception accorded us was symbolic of the reconciliation of all parties in France and even the most stalwart French Radicals approved it.

The gentleman who introduced the delegation to the Cardinal Archbishop was Denis Cichin, one of the most brilliant men in France and a member of the French Academy. As a testimonial to his marvellous gifts as an orator he has been the chief spokesman of the Catholic party in the French chamber since the death of Count de Mun. He is universally popular, even among the strongest of his opponents. A tall man of great robustness, with a shaggy beard and a quiet expression, he looks not unlike a good-natured mastiff. He completely won the hearts of all the Irishmen.

The municipal life of Ireland was represented by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, Thomas Condon, who is Mayor of Clonmel as well as member from Tipperary. Everywhere the mission received the most enthusiastic welcome. All the speeches referred in terms of affection to the long ties
