Interesting Relics of the 104th New Brunswick Regiment—Contrasted With Modern Uniforms and Equipment

The window of the dry goods store of J. J. Weddall & Sons is attracting much attention today. It contains an exhibit of uniforms and other military articles which are of great interest, particularly in view of the fact that Lieut. Col. G. W. Fowler, M.P., once commanding the 104th Battalion, is to be in this city next Wednesday night, to address a big recruiting meeting.

The principal features of the display the greater part of which was shown in St. John some time ago, are two uniforms, one of modern times and of khaki, the other of the time of the 104th New Brunswick Regt., which fought against the Americans in the war of 1812-14. This includes a coat of scarlet with facings of blue and heavy gold lace and was worn by the City Militia of St. John and a head-dress consisting of a large peaked shako with plume of red and green hackles. The contrast between the two uniforms is marked. Flintlock muskets of the same period and Ross rifles of the type now used by the Canadian troops afford a similar contrast.

Other exhibits are the commission of the late Capt. Charles Rainsford as lieutenant in the New Brunswick Fencibles, afterward the 104th and a portrait of Capt. Rainsford of same regiment, a cavalry sword carried by the late Col. Stone, great grandfather of Dr. E. Stooe Wiggins of St. John, a silver tray and a mustard pot used by the officers' mess of the 104th.

Selections from the history of the 104th appear in the window also portraits of Lt. Col. Fowler and Major P. A. Guthrie.
