

Poetry.

For the Christian Visitor.

LINES,

On the death of Josephine Foster, who was drowned at Chute's Cove, Nova Scotia, June 30, 1860, aged 21 years. A few years previous he had been brought down to death's door by fever, but was spared in answer to the fervent prayers of a Christian mother, who earnestly entreated that he might give evidence of conversion before he should die. This happy change, it is hoped and believed, took place during a precious season of Revival, about a year before his death, and his mother had for some time had a presentiment that she would be called to part with him suddenly. While lamenting o'er his dead body she could not but render thanks that prayer had been answered in his behalf.

She kneels! a mother kneels,
Beside the couch of pain;
Can those deep-toned appeals,
The struggling soul detain?
Hear! O thou gracious God!
That agonizing prayer;
Remove thy chastening rod,
And let thy goodness spare.
Not for his life she prays,
As bending o'er her son,
She lifts her earnest gaze,
And says—"Thy will be done."
No! I loved my only die!
I found my righteous will;
Low in the dust I lie,
Humbled, resigned, and still;
But, O! let grace divine
His heart and soul renew;
That mighty arm of thine,
Sin's crushing power subdue;
Speak but the healing word,
Till changed by love divine,
He bows before the Lord,
To bless that hand of thine.

The prayer of faith is heard;
And heard the solemn vow;
Comes the life-giving word,
To flush the marble brow.
She hears him pray, and feels
That God her Saviour's near;
The wounded heart he heals,
Dissolving doubt and fear.
Months pass, I learn from high
The heavenly dew distill;
And many an earnest cry
Goes up from Zion's hill.
The penitential groan—
The agonizing prayer;
The burdened sinner's moan,
The joys that angels share.
And he among the rest
Yields to a Saviour's love;
Peace fills and fires his breast,
All radiant from above.
Where Christians meet for prayer,
Mother and child now meet;
Mingling their praises there,
Low at the mercy seat.
O holy, happy hour!
When first her raptured ear,
That music deep, that power
Of grace divine could hear.
Now guard him, gracious Heaven!
The helpless child defend;
Let grace and strength be given,
And keep him to the end.

Hark! 'tis the answer comes!
God speaking from the sky;
Speaking in thunder-tones,
Deep-sounding from on high,
Sounding alarm and dread,
As gathers round the dead,
The stricken, shuddering throng,
Stretched on the wave-worn strand.
The lifeless body lies,
Death waves his icy hand
In triumph o'er the prize.
Rings loud the doleful wail,
The deep heart-rending cry:
Oh! cannot prayers prevail?
And must he, must he die!
Great God! sustain us now,
Help in this awful hour!
Broken and crushed we bow,
Beneath thy sovereign power,
Bear on the peaceful dead!
Back to the chamber bear;
Where late she bowed her head,
And poured that "Mother's prayer."
Nay! weep! fond mother, weep!
Thy Saviour's tears could flow;
Sisters and sirs, drink deep,
Of undimmed woe.
Mourn for the loved, the lost;
Mourn o'er his early tomb,
By grief's rude surges torn;
Weep for his sudden doom.
Mourn, but not hopeless mourn;
Not dead—not lost—but gone,
On angel-pinions borne,
To hail that heavenly dawn.
These beckoning from the sky,
He bids you speed your way,
To that bright home on high,
Where reigns eternal day.
Mourn! for 'tis sweet to mourn,
But mourn with mingled peace;
Till passed life's sorrowing bourne,
All mourning there shall cease.

THE THREE SUNDAYS.

BY ALIEMA.

AURELIA'S SUNDAY.

She tips up the church steps very daintily, indeed; very gracefully she sails up the aisle and into the softly-cushioned pew; with a pretty little devout air, she reclines, for a moment, her fair brow upon the back of the seat just in front; with a bewitching little flourish, she slips her tiny brodered kerchief over her ermine muff and leans back among the cushions. She opens her gold and blue velvet prayer-book, but knows not that instead of the morning prayers, she has opened to the "service for the burial of the Dead."

She revives a little, as a sweet air from some favorite opera falls upon her ear, and she thinks that the colors in the chancel windows are not unlike those of the flames into which Giovanni rushes from the presence of his marble guest. In his deep voice, the white-robed man of God reads the beautiful words of the Litany, and Aurelia responds to her own private petitions, "From all long services, Good Lord deliver us," "From stupid partners in the redow, Good Lord deliver us," "And from so much getting up and sitting down, Good Lord deliver us;" for on Saturday night she danced till Sunday morning, and the memory of honeyed nothings, which came stealing through Leander's dear little mousetache, mingles strangely with words uttered in the deep bass, which she takes for granted are the sermon.

She must hold up her head, for, with womanly intuition, she feels that the eyes of all the Joneses are resting on the back of her new dress-bonnet. It will stand inspection, for the lace is point and the flowers are French, and the consciousness that the Smiths are at this moment scrutinizing the face trimmings, alone enables her to suppress the yawn which might displace a bud. For the hundredth time, she counts the creases in the giant sticks of "colts foot rock" which support the ceiling, and wonders how long the Christ-mas evergreens will be allowed to remain.

Very willingly she bows her head for the closing prayers, and she steals a little gloved hand up to straighten the "stunning bows" beneath her pinky chin.

It is so irreverent to hasten out of church, as well as unstylish, that the Paris hat must take a long time for its devotions; so when it slowly rises, there is Leander just by the pew-door ready to escort the best dancer in his "set" to her luxurious carriage.

Now Aurelia is quite another being—she chats and similes; and, when ensconced in the easiest of easy chairs, she devours first the Home Journal and then the Monthly, she is entirely herself again—Miss Aurelia Bubble, of Fifth Avenue.

THE GREY CHILDREN'S SUNDAY.

"Samuel," groaned Mr. Grey, in his Sunday voice, "it is full five minutes since I called you; get up this minute, sir. I am astonished to see a child of mine slumbering away the blessed hours of the holy sabbath. Thank the Lord, I have one child who appreciates his privilege, in having been born to pious parents in this Christian land, where one day has been set aside from all the seven for special penance and prayer."

"Susan, is it possible I heard you laughing on this consecrated day? Come here instantly. Irreverent child, and learn this verse in the Holy Bible, and if I hear from you again you will learn a whole chapter. Strange, with such an example as John Henry, you cannot learn to regard the Fourth Commandment. Your brother was up at five, and knew his catechism at six, and has been sitting upright, in his chair, the last two hours, storing his mind with precious passages, while in all that time, you have not sat still a moment."

"Will, can't you stop that child's crowing? The babe is father of the child, and our only way is to plant in the infantile mind the seeds which we wish to become the perfect fruit of righteousness."

"Susan, how long are you going to be putting on your things. Ah me! 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.' Do you know where you will go, child, if you tie your bonnet-strings before the glass? Put down that flower, I warrant you will find follies enough in your heart to make you forget the text, without taking them in your hands; and mind, unless you remember the text, one of the longest of 'Watt's Hymns' to learn before dinner."

"Samuel, are you chasing that squirrel? Didn't you know that Satan put it into that creature's heart to run before you, just to tempt you to the straight and narrow path to church? Fold your hands before you like your brother; John Henry, and keep your eyes on the ground from whence you came. Don't you know that the serpent the subtlest beast in the garden, had to eat dirt for tempting Eve to taste an apple on Sunday?"

"John Henry, my son, sit between your brother and sister to keep them quiet, and tell me if you see any misdemeanors."

"Samuel, can it be that John Henry saw you smiling at that little puppet, Emmie Allen, in meeting? This afternoon sir, you will wear grandfather's green shawl over your eyes; and Susan, if you don't sit stiller, I shall take you to evening service all the week."

"Will, it pains my heart to see that babe sleeping away these sanctified hours. Pity he is not grown enough, to be preparing for the great end of man. John Henry, what is the chief end of man? Right sir. When we get up Sunday morning, we ought to reflect—before night I may be lying in this place a cold, white corpse, and my immortal soul have entered upon an eternal Sabbath, or be in that dreadful place, where is 'weeping and gnashing of teeth.' As we go along to church, we should keep thinking that any ungodly Jehu, driving along the turnpike to perdition, might dash our brains out against a stone wall, and we, instead of setting in church a blessed two hours, be brought home crushed and mangled, and in the agonies of death."

"Susan, why don't you eat your dinner? I rejoice that you are not so lost to all sensibility, as not to see how fearful is the uncertainty of life."

"I am glad to say, children, that you improved in your behaviour this afternoon. Susan, you looked at the minister very steadily. His sermon was a strange coincidence with my own remarks at noon. Now, take your books, all of you, and learn your Sunday School lessons for to-day week, till sundown. Wife here is a picture-book for you to show to the babe. There is a picture of Korah and his friends, plunging head-first into the bowels of the earth, and another of Jael, nailing Sisera to the floor of her tent. We must begin early with that heir of immortality."

"The sun has set. Sam, bring me my pipe and tobacco, and then go and help Tom get out the wagon. I am going to take that pig over to Smith, he offered to trade."

Poor Susie threw her weary little limbs on the bed, and cried herself to sleep, and dreamed of going to heaven, and finding it was all a mistake about its being always Sunday there; but it was one long, glad, sunshiny Saturday afternoon; and she could run, and jump, and sing, with bright, strange birds, that sang so sweetly, and pick such wondrously lovely flowers, and play in such sparkling waters, that Susie, when she waked up, told Sam, "that perhaps heaven was a dear, sweet place, as Miss Sally said, after all."

ELLEN'S SUNDAY.

Up betimes, for society has its week-time claims, and she must not go to her little class, till kneeling by her bed, she has put aside the world and worldly things, and prayed for wisdom, to interest and instruct the little ones who, except from her lips, never hear the name of Jesus mentioned lovingly.

With a heart full of love and pity, she takes her place among her ragged scholars, and their wan, unchildish faces brighten, as she tells them about her canary bird, that just as soon as he got a peep at the sun this morning, sang such beautiful little hymns to God, that all the other birds that heard it sang too, till their little hearts seemed bursting with joy and thankfulness for the peace and quiet of the sweet Sabbath morning; and she tells them she will teach a hymn to sing every Sunday morning, when they pray to God to keep them from breaking his holy day. The little children look very sorry, when the time comes that they must leave their kind teacher, and she, with quiet happiness in her heart, enters her seat in church. For a moment, she bows her head in heart-felt, though unspoken prayer and thanksgiving. With an earnest desire for instruction, she listens to the sermon, and gathering the wheat thereof, does not dwell upon the chaff—the gorgeous imagery and flowery rhetoric with which the good man adorns his discourse. And when, the sermon over, she again bows to receive, with all the congregation, the solemn benediction, it is with the feeling that, into her basket of heavenly wisdom one more pearl has been dropped.

Once more at home, and seated by the bedside of her invalid mother, she gives an outline of the sermon; tells whom she saw, and what they said; how the choir are improving, and how much their fine music adds to her enjoyment; how her class seem to love the Sunday School, and how beautifully green and fresh all earth will be, when her sick mother once more goes out to drink in health with the spring air and sunshine.

The afternoon she spends at home, reading aloud, and telling Bible stories to her little brothers and sisters, who are glad to "be quiet and good" for the pleasure of passing a whole half day in "mother's room." To the children, the Sabbath is not made irksome by two sermons, full of big words, and far beyond their comprehension, besides two sessions of Sunday School, but Sunday afternoon is even happier than Saturday, for then they have "sister Ellen" all to themselves, to tell them stories, or talk to them of heaven and heavenly things.

And when at night Ellen lies down to rest, it is with mind and body strengthened for the trials, and temptations, and duties of the week, and a heart full of gratitude to Him who made the Sabbath day and hallowed it, bidding us remember and keep it holy, for it is the day of the Lord our God.
