CHRISTIAN LOVE AND LOYALTY OR, THE REBEL RECLAIMED.

STERN MEASURES.

Thinketh no Evil.

Wretched girl, have you read it?" Startling as the forest-snake's rattle were these words, hissed rather than spoken into the ears of Grace, as a hand was laid so heavily on her shoulders as to prevent the possibility of her rising from her steoping position beside the bird. Grace was so much alarmed and confused by the question, that it was repeated before she could stammer forth, " Yes."

"Then my life is in your hands!" muttered Jaspar, as he suffered the girl to resume a standing posture, while rather tightening than relaxing his grasp on her shoulder. Grace glanced at his face, and that glance, even more than his words, filled her young heart with terror. She saw the pale bloodless countenance of a desperate man, whose tone and manner seemed rather to express "your life is in my hands," than " mine is in yours."

Grace clasped her hand with a gesture of entreaty-"O Sir! forgive me-I meant no harm!" "And you shall do no harm !" muttered Jaspar, his wild eye glaring restlessly around, as if he sought some means of effectually silencing her who had accidentally discovered the clue to his Grace trembled with fear. She could scarcely in the confusion of her ideas, comprehend what had happened-what was revealed-what danger was to be apprehended; but she felt that a dark gulf had suddenly opened between her and her guardian, that she had become to him an object of suspicion and dread, and that he was a wicked, unscrupulous man, who was certainly committing some crime which he might seek to conceal by another. The poor child could not have traced out the links of thought which led to such a conclusion, but so strong was the fear which it raised that she felt inclined to scream aloud, in order to bring some one to her assistance.

"Utter a word-and you shall never add another!" said Jasper Barburn, in a tone low, but very distinct.

The threat did not tend to allay the fears of Grace Vernon. The few moments which followed of apparent indecision on the part of Jaspar, were to her terrible moments. A faint cry for help rose from the heart of the girl-but it scarcely took the form of a prayer. " Lift up that-it must not be left here!" said

Jaspar, pointing to the dead bird at her feet. Grace obeyed, and raised the pigeon from the ground; the little winged messenger that the smuggler had so carefully brought from Barfleur

-that Liberia-little guessing what she bore had conveyed in a basket to her father; the carrier bird which, but for that accidental shot, would have been bearing a message of treason across the wide waves to France. Grace dropped her book as she stooped, but did not notice that she had done so. "You must come with me now," said Jaspar.

Still with that heavy grasp on her shoulder, and the dead bird in her trembling hand, Grace was led towards the Nina Tower. This part of Braburn Castle, as the reader knows, was a recent addition-and was connected with the rest of the building by a door which communicated with Jaspar's own apartment; but it had another door on the ground floor, low and arched, which opened on a shady part of the shrubbery, and of which Mr. Braburn kept the key. Towards this spot Jaspar now drew the reluctant Grace. spot Jaspar now drew the reluctant Grace. latter year (1858) again show the "Royal" as more than maintaining the ratio of its increase as stated in former years. left he unlocked the door, and then in a tone of command bade her enter the Tower.

Very unwillingly Grace crossed the threshold, and entered the strange gloomy place, followed by the guardian whom she feared. A staircase, very steep, very dark, and very narrow, led winding round and round to the top of the toweropening at each successive story, by means of a was 832, the sum assured £387,752 6s. 8d., and the premium door, upon a small irregular-shaped room. None of these rooms were yet finished; the scent of mortar hung about them still; with unpapered walls, and floors cumbered with shavings and rubbish, they looked like a series of wretched cells, of which it would be difficult to imagine the use. Into the very lowest of these cells, which was paved with stone, Jaspar threw the dead pigeon, which he had taken from Grace. He then by a gesture of his hand, commanded her to mount the steep staircase. The knees of Grace trembled beneath her, so that it was with difficulty that she obeyed. Up-and up-and upit seemed as though those wearisome steps would never come to an end! Grace, however, dared not pause, for Jaspar also was mounting, and the sound of his heavy tramp behind her chilled her blood with fear.

At length Grace reached the top of the staircase, and entered, through a low door-way, the highest room in the Tower. It was similar to all the rest, except that it was somewhat larger, being less encroached upon by the staircase; and that instead of being lighted by a slit of a window, it had only a skylight let into the ceiling. Jaspar did not follow his step-daughter into the cell, he stood on the steps as he addressed her, not looking at her as he spoke-

You know more than you ought to know, and I must take care that you do not say more than you ought to say. Any attempt, either to escape or to make your position known-will draw down my heaviest vengeance upon you!" With this threat on his lips, Jaspar closed the door, and locked it, and Grace heard his tread, growing fainter and fainter, as he hastily descended the stair.

Not till the sound died quite away did Grace feel as if she could breathe freely, or collect her scattered thoughts. She was a prisoner-a prisoner to her own natural protector; what was her crime, what had she done, what would happen next? Grace sank down on some shavings of wood, pressed both her hands upon her forehead, and tried to realize her position. She recalled the words on the scroll; she had but given them a hasty glance, but they seemed indelibly stamped upon her mind. She had not at the first moment recognized the hand writing of Jaspar, but his subsequent conduct had not left the shadow of a doubt as to who had penned them. Indignation, aversion, increased by personal fear, swelled in the heart of the captive.

"Wicked man! false to his king, false to his God, and cruel to the orphan, left in his charge, what crime is he likely to shrink from 2. There what crime is he likely to shrink from ! There can be no honor, no generosity, left in his traitor soul; conscience itself must be dead! I should not wonder if he intended to leave me hear to starve in this horrible Tower, where no one ever would find me!" Grace Vernon shuddered at the thought. "But what if I do him wrong, if, even at this moment, there be a struggle in his heart between the right and the wrong? That restless walking up and down last night, his altered looks, his strange manner, do they not seem to show that his heart is not yet hard, that though he may have fallen for a while, he yet may rise and live for better things? Surely God directed the live for better things? Surely God directed the shot that struck down that poor carrier-pigeon, to give my step-father time to reflect, and draw back from a course so disloyal? Oh! he cannot be so bad—so utterly bad, or my mother would never have loved him! Let me not dare to judge or condemn. "Charity thinketh no evil?" Let me hope for him, pray for him yet, and keep down these hope for him, pray for him yet, and keep down these hope for him, pray for him and country, these are facts which I cannot help seeing; but what is done in an hour of passion, may be repented of in calmer moments, and I cannot-dare not-will not believe that Mr. Braburn could hurt my mother's orphan child!"

Notwithstanding this resolve not to wrong another, even in thought, not to juage harldly or suspect unjustly, the heart of poor Grace beat very fast, as her ear, quickened by the alarm, caught the sound of the opening of the outer door of the Tower. She breathed in short gasps as nearer and nearer came a heavy step up the staircase. Grace looked anxiously round to see if there were no means of blocking up the door from within. Not an article of furniture was in the cell; nothing appeared but a small ladder of which one end rested against the frame of the skylight, showing Grace that it was to be used as a door and window. She started up with a momentary intention of hurrying up the ladder, getting on the roof by means of the skylight, and thence calling loudly for help in hopes that even from that height her voice might reach some ear. But Grace had not time to do this, and prudence told her that such an attempt would but serve to irritate her jailer, and perhaps drive him to harsher measures. It would be better to appeal to her step-father's feelings-to promise secrecy, to show submission. As calmly as she could, though cold with apprehension, Grace awaited the open-

Jaspar, as on the former occasion, did not enter the cell of his captive. He stood on the stair as he put into the room, first an earthen pitcher filled with water, and then a loaf of dry bread. Grace saw that this prisoner's fare was intended for herself, and felt alarmed at the prospect before her of long, solitary confinement.

"O sir! for my mother's sake," she pleaded do not shut me up here all alone! I will not betray you, I will tell no one what I have seen, I will die ere I bring you into trouble!"

" You shall indeed die ere you bring me into trouble," was the stern reply of Jaspar Braburn, " but I shall take my own way of insuring your silence." Then again carefully locking the door, he descended the narrow stair, leaving his poor little prisoner behind him to the solitude of her ngs, Liverpool. Chairman of the London Board.—Samuel Baker, Esq. Chairman in Liverpool.—Charles Turner, Esq.

The Royal Insurance Company is one of the largest Offices in the kingdom.
At the Annual Meeting held in August 1859, the following highly satisfactory results were shown:— FIRE DEPARTMENT. The most gratifying proof of the expansion of the business is exhibited in the one following fact—that the increase alone of the last three years exceeds the entire business of some of the existing and tre insurance companies of this kingdom.

The Premiums for the year 1855 being.....£120,060 While the Premiums for the year loss are.... 196,148 or upwards of 50 per cent. in three years. The recent returns of duty made by Government for this Only one among the London insurance offices exhibits an advance to the extent of one-half the increase of the Company, while all the others respectively fall far short of the moiety of its advance.

LIFE DEPARTMENT.

The amount of new Life Premiums received this year is by far the largest received in any similar period since the commencement of the business, and must far exceed the average of amount received by the most successful offices in the kingdom. The number of policies issued in the year #12,854 8s. 4d. These figures show a very rapid extension of business during the last ten years. Thus:—
