OHRISTIAN LOVE AND LOYALTY; OR, THE REBEL RECLAIMED.

THE REMONSTRANCE.

Doth not behave itself unseemly "There-your dress will look as well as ever," said Grace Vernon as she rose from her knees. "You're a capital hand with your needle," ob served Liberia; "I suppose because you've al ways been obliged to do a lot of stitching and mending." The remark was not very courteous, and Grace had to think again of the lowly character of Charity to prevent its making her angry. Liberia, either not noticing the flush on her companion's cheek, or attributing it to her late stooping posture, went on in her easy off-hand style-"I care less about this dress, though it is pretty, because I shall soon have another, and one made of real French silk." "How can that be?" asked Grace, who had resumed her seat; "since the breaking out of the war such a thing cannot be bought in any shop in the Island." "Shop! I daresay not!" replied Liberia, with a little laugh; "but there are ways and means of getting pretty things without going near any shop. I shall buy a French dress to-night with the guineas which papa gave me last week."

"To-night!" echoed the astonished Grace "Why, yes," replied Liberia, lowering her tone, and glancing at the door; "I'll tell you how it is, if you'll be secret. Just before Lady Laurie's carriage was driven to the gate, I was standing in the shrubbery looking through the bars, when old Judith, the fisherman's mother, came up from her cottage on the beach. She walked at her creeping pace, yet with the air of one who is harried, glancing from side to side, in a stealthy, sly sort of way.' "I never feel as if I could trust that old wo man," said Grace. "Oh! her son is well known to be a smuggler, he was in prison a few years ago. But to return to old Judith. She seemed to me to be watching for some one, and yet afraid lest she should be caught watching; and it strikes me," observed Liberia, as the idea suddenly occurred to her mind, "that we've had more of the Government people about our place lately, than we had ever before."

" Doubtless on account of the war," said Grace, "our bay would be a convenient place for land-

"Oh! I wish that the French would come over, and see what a warm reception we would give them! But they'll wait till the 'Aurora' has passed down Channel, lest the guns of fighting Braburn should make fine havoc of their flat-bottomed boats?" "In the meantime, perhaps you will tell me about Judith," said Grace.

"Where was I at in my story? Oh! I remember, I left the old creature hobbling up to the gate. She had caught sight of me where I stood, so putting her withered face again the bars, she said, in a croaking kind of whisper, 'If Miss will come alone to my cottage after darknot afore, she shall see something worth the seeing. The boat has arrived from t'other side o' the water, and there's a sight o' pretty things

"Of course you will not go," said Grace. "Of course I shall!" exclaimed Liberia.

"Alone-after dark-to a smuggler's ?" "Why, silly child, the cottage is not fifty yards from our gate, and I knew old Judith long before I had ever heard your name. This won't be the first time that I've ventured. You remember my dainty green scarf, and the pretty kid gloves that I showed you? They were bought in that cottage, after dusk, and for about half the price that would have been charged for them in any shop in the island." "But I wonder how you, who are so loyal, can have anything to do with those who defraud the king of his due! Government needs money to keep up the army and navy to defend us, ministers to direct, and judges to maintain good order in the land! We, who are safe and quiet at home, have no reason to complain if taxes and customs make us pay a little more than we should otherwise do for the luxuries that we may fancy.'

"What fun it is to hear a little shrimp like you talking political economy!" laughed Liberia. "I don't even know what those long words mean," replied Grace; "but the question on which we were speaking seems to be very simple. If the Government has a right to lay duties upon goods from abroad, is it not our duty to pay them? Is it not to 'render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's,' and to honor the king, as we are told to do in the Bible?"

"Honor him! I do honor him with all my heart and soul, and would die for him to-morrow.

"You would die for him," said Grace Vernon archly, "but not give up for his sake a pair of French gloves, or a piece of French ribbon.' "Tut! what can my buying a few smuggled articles matter to the king ?" cried Liberia.

"It may matter to yourself," said Grace. "It does matter so far," laughed Liberia, "that I dress better, and spend less money than I should, had I your ridiculous scruples; while the beef-eaters at Windsor Castle won't have one inch less of gold lace on their coats for all the French silk that I wear."

"I wish that I could explain myself better," said Grace, who found difficulty in putting into words what was perfectly clear to her own mind, "I meant that this seems to be a matter of simple honesty, as well as loyalty. It is not right to cheat a subject, nor is it right to cheat the king. He may be none the worse for our doing so, but because some miners may be stifled in the pit."

"Oh! no," exclaimed Grace, with earnestness. "the cases are by no means the same. There is no sin, no dishonesty, no disobedience to the laws of God or man in the calling of a fisherman ar. Remember that the poor smuggler not only his life but his soul!"

n't stand that kind of talk," cried Libenothing but nonsense and cant. People ske care of their own souls; if they do for the sale of gain, it is their concern,

Grace could not press the question further, nose of Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" re is no cruelty like that which the selfish so show, when for their own amusement or they tempt astray the souls over which resistion gives them influence. The master of makes his servents break the Sabbath, the present who puts a lie into the mouths of young men, the baver who asceives goods to be suspects to have been pilfered, will they canything to answer for upon the great day of account? Will not their brother's blood be required of them then ?

"There is another reason why you should not go to-night," said Grace, in the hesitating tone of one who is fearful of giving offence.

"What may that be?" asked Liberia. "Do you think that it is proper-right-for young girls such as we to go out after dark quite alone?

"What's the harm?" inquired Liberia, ab-

"It does not look seemly," murmured Grace, afraid to glance at her companion as she uttered the word. But Liberia, instead of being angry, only burst out laughing.

"It is easy to see what a prim, old fashioned school you have been brought up in-you are starched like one of Lady Laurie's fine ruffles! What do I care how things look-if I myself know that all is right?" "But people might say-

"Let them say what they like !" cried Liberia, proudly shaking her auburn tresses; "I'll not be robbed of my freedom-I'll not be tied down by the absurd rules that society makes for itself."

"O Liberia! it is not society alone-that would indeed be a poor guide; but my dear mother used to say that we are commanded to think of whatsoever things are of good report, that we must not behave ourselves unseemly-and that every girl should so act as never to be talked of. or only talked of with respect."

"Keep your advice to yourself!" exclaimed Liberia with flashing eyes, "I'll neither be lectured nor guided by you! I'll do what I like and go where I please; you really take a mighty deal upon you, on the strength of being noticed by a lady with a handle to her name! I'm quite as good a judge of what is seemly and becoming, as even the great niece of Viscountess Laurie and darting a glance of mingled anger and contempt at her companion, the haughty girl quitted

"I am sure that my mother was right," thought Grace, as she sat by the window in pensive mood, for the exhibaration caused by the visit of her aunt had now passed away. "How often has she told me that a bold, forward girl is like a rose stripped of its mose, or a fruit with its down rubbed away! She said that a Christian maiden should be known at a glance by her sober dress, and her modest manner. One of the verses which she most often repeated was that which bids women adorn themselves in modest apparal, with shamefacedness and sobriety. It seems as if many forget that there is such a command in the Bible, they are so free and so bold! Oh! that I may always be guided to act as she would have wished her child to have acted, and keep not only from great offences, but abstain from all appearance of evil!"

"Oh! my conscience does not trouble me on that score," said Liberia.

"And do you think it well done to encourage men to break the laws of their country, and risk their own lives by smuggling goods across the sea? Is not your buying what they have no right to sell, actually tempting them to ruin? If Judith's son were killed by the officers in some night struggle, would you feel quite clear of his blood?"

Liberia looked a little graver. "Men must run some risks," she observed; "you might as well say that we should never taste fish, because some fishermen are drowned in the sea—nor use coal, because some miners may be stifled in the pit."

"Oh! no," exclaimed Grace, with earnestness.
