From the Christian Times. A LIFE SCENE.

"This earth is not a kindly place For raising heavenly flowers, They perish in our blind embrace, They need their native bowers." Anon.

I saw a little girl, as she wandered "o'er hill and dale," plucking here and there sweet flowers. How tenderly did she gaze upon them, and how her young heart delighted in their beauty. But the bright day closed, and the dark mantle of night fell about her, and the cold hand of frost touched those woodland flowers, and they died.

At the first dawn of morning she looked out upon the desolate world, and then turning to her mother, with tearful eyes and trembling lips, she asked, "Mamma, why did God send the cruel frost to kill my flowers!" The mother wiped away her tears and replied, "My child, God Shawls, Linens, Hollands, and Sheetings doeth all things well. This earth must not be to us an Eden; we might love it too fondly and forget to wish for heaven. He will crush many of your fairest flowers of life, and in eternity you will see his loving kindness in so doing."

The child grew to be a woman and she became a happy bride. It was well she could not lift the veil of the future and behold the angel of death as he bent o'er her pathway.

One year of happiness and joy passed away. A lovely infant was placed in her arms, and pressing it to her bosom she exclaimed, "My treasure !'

Life was beautiful with those violet eyes peeping into her own, and the soft white arms clinging around her neck, as the bird-like voice warbled forth the one word "mamma."

But God's ways are not our ways, and in the councils of heaven the angel of death was commissioned to visit earth and pluck one of its fairest flowers to place in his garden of love, beyond the reach of the poisonous breath of sin. The angel, obeying heaven's mandate, visited that cottage home, and saw that the child was too fair for earth; he touched its fair cheek with his icy finger; the dimples forgot their merry dance, and the bright eyes grew dim, and the angel bore away the infant saying, "Beautiful is this floweret which I have plucked for my heavenly

The bright rays crept softly through the half open blind and lingered upon a fair face, which looked lovely beneath the coffin lid, with lips gracefully composed as if to say, " Mamma, murmur not."

In my faith I looked beyond and saw the angel standing before the throne of God with the glorified spirit of the child, which looked up and smiled the sweet smile of innocence. God placed it in his garden of beauty, and it was happy. But the mother upon earth cried out in the anguish of her soul, "Why did God give me this sweet bud of promise, and just as it began to unfold one by one its tiny leaves of beauty, suffer the cold frost of death to cut it down?"

She remembered her childish grief at the death of her flowers, and again she heard the gentle voice of her mother saving, "He doeth all things

She opened her Bible and read, "For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth," and, "Suffer the Steamers. little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of God." And she bowed her head and whispered, "Thy will be done."

Perhaps there are mothers who will read this "life scene," that have folded away in their closet the dear little frock and the tiny shoe to remind them of their flower of beauty which is now blooming above.

Warm tears and kisses have often fallen upon the garments they last saw upon their darling. To such I would say, God is love, and in the courts of heaven your child beckons you away from this weary world to that of eternal sunshine, and there you will understand why it was best for you to suffer bereavement and grief.

WORK AND PLAY.

When I was young, I was taught these lines: "All work and no play Makes Jack a dull boy; But all play and no work Makes him a mere tov." And so I had to mix work with play when I was a child; and now I am a man, I think still of this verse, for it seems to me so good and true. large, strong boys at play in the yard. At night, when I came home, I saw them still there. They were tired out with play, and lay on the ground or sat on the fence, and looked to me as though they were not much pleased. Boys," said I, " have you been here all day?" "Yes," they cried."

"And what have you done to-day?" "We have played."

"What! Have you played all the long day?"

"Yes."

"And have you done no work?" " No: we have no work to do."

"O boys, you must not play all the time. It will spoil you. A boy who spends all his time in play cannot make a good man. You must work, boys, work."

Then I went home. The next day, as I went by, I saw the same

"Come," said I-"come with me. I will give vod some work to do. God made us to work : did you not know it ?"

They looked at me as though they did not know what I meant, but they came on by my side. I took them to the woods, and told them to fill their arms full of the sticks that lay on the ground, and take them home, and pile them up on one side of their yard, and then to come back to me. They did as I told them. They had to go a good way, and got quite tired; but they did just as I said. When they came back I told them to fill their arms once more, and do the name thing, and come back to me; to be sure and come back. Three of them did as I told them, and came back, but two of them ran off.

When the three came back I made them sit down on the grass, and gave them a nice slice of bread and meat, and then a large pear. Then I gave them a few nuts, which they cracked and ate. Then they took home two more loads of wood, and by that time I had done my work, and was on my way home. We talked as fast as our tongues could run, all the way, and when we reached the yard where they had piled up their sticks, I looked in to see how they had done it. It was a good piece of work, and I was much pleased. I praised the boys, and then I Mackintosh's Celebrated Make of

"Well, boys, have you not had a good time

"Yes, O yes," they all cried.
"You see it is just as I told you. God made us to work, and no one feels pleased in his own heart who does not live for some use. It will make you feel like men to work. You must learn something new each day. Now will you "O yes, yes," they said. "It is first-rate; we
