and devastation has marked its course. On the level prairie of Illinois the storm has held high carnival, no natural barrier interposed to check its progress.

Scores, perhaps hundreds of persons will have been lost, their property destroyed, and their homes left desolate.

A train on the Michigan Central road got stuck thirteen miles from Chicago, and the Cleveland Herald gives the following account of the sufferings of the passengers:

The cars on that road are provided with patent stoves, which will burn only when the cars are in motion, and consequently when the cars stopped the fire went out.

There were five passenger cars in the train, well filled—about one hundred and fifty in all, a large number of whom were women and children.

They lay there from Thursday afternoon till Friday morning, when the Michigan Southern road arrived, which also became blocked, and could proceed no further.

They were badly frost-bitten, some so severely that they will lose their hands or feet. The officers of both trains did everything that could possibly be done under the circumstances for the comfort of passengers.

A distance of three hundred yards, more or less, was to be traversed. The snow was deeply drifted, the snow and frost of the wind was sweeping the path like a storm of grape.
