The Samily Circle.

Up the Ladder; or, Striving and Thriving.

"Be sure your sins will find you out."

For six months, began Harrison, "I have been in the store of Grant & Co., on Central Wharf." Mr. Clarkson started, stood for a moment irre-solute, and then sat down again. "I was engaged to do the work of a boy, and was to have thirteen dollars a month, with a promise of increase of wages, if 1 did well, You know I am not afraid of work ; and I tried to do my very best. It was just such a store as I had longed to be in, and at first I was delighted with my situation." Harrison sighed heavily, and then went on "As errand-boy, I was around in all parts of the store, and one day I overheard Mr. Grant swearing terribly at the head clerk. They were alone in the office. I suppose he did not realize that any one could hear him. I was dreadfully frightened, and stood still. The clerk, whose name is Ransom, answered him back in the same angry tone,

'I'll expose you then.' " And criminate yourself,' said Mr. Grant. " ' Kilby will forgive that, for exposing your villainy,' retorted the clerk.

"I crawled softly away, and went up stairs. What could they have meant? At first, I could only imagine that the life of some one was in danger; but, after lying awake almost all night over it, I determined to be on my guard, and watch the actions of my employer.

"A part of my duty was to clear the office of rubbish, which had accumulated through the day. Newspapers and old letters were generally crumpled and thrown under the table, to show they were of no further use. These I gathered in a basket, and carried away to the place assigned them. One day I wanted a piece of paper, and, having noticed that often there was a half sheet thrown under the table, I went and selected one which had only a few words written on it It was the beginning of a letter addressed to L. F. Kilby, Esq. Then, in the first line, a word was misspelled, and the whole was thrown aside. The next piece I took was this letter, which had been copied, but not filed. Hardly knowing what I was doing, I began to read, but was just going to throw it aside, when my curiosity was roused by these words : 'Trade still dreadfully dull. Haven't sold a hundred bushels for a week. Mr. Ransom has concluded to take the front store, as I wrote in my last, for storage. He has some scheme, a wild one, I fear. I waited for your answer till the last moment, hoping you would veto the bargain ; but, as'-This too," added Harrison, "for some reason, was left incomplete. I put it in my pocket.

"During the week of which he spoke, we had been sending off immense quantities of wheat corn, and other grains. I began to understand the game. All this time I was very much excited, and lost my appetite. I didn't know what it was my duty to do. I suppose I felt worse in consequence of knowing that Mr. Haven's partner had ruined him, and caused his death. I used to see Mr. Grant open his office door and beckon Mr. Ransom in. Sometimes I used to loiter up near the partition, so as to hear what they were saying.

"One day I heard Mr. Grant say, 'I'm afraid he's got wind of it. He'll pounce right upon as some day.' "We must prepare for him,' said the

The secret partner then inquired if Harrison would return to the store that afternoon. " No, sir," replied the boy, drawing himself up to his full height ; "I shall never go there again. I should have left at the end of a month, but for the hope of being able to prove something against them, as I was sure they were meditating some crime.

"Which you have well done," said the lawyer; and I advise you not to leave your work incomplete.

Go, as usual, to your business in the morning," added Mr. Kilby : "and when the safe is open, keep the key in your own possession. It may be that the old books have not yet been removed; or, if they have been, try to ascertain to what place. They will be so taken by surprise to see me, they may betray themselves. If so, it will be unnecessary to have you appear connected with the affair."

in an indifferent tone.

" How is it possible to do it ? asked the other. ". Why, by a false set of books,' suggested Mr.

"I had access to all the books, as well as to the safe, for the key I always left with the store key, at Mr. Grant's house. After this, I noticed that Mr. Ransom was very much engaged in writing; and the accountant was required to copy from this day-book into another, which he calls the journal.

"One day he did not make his appearance and the clerk, after sending to his boarding house, and finding that he was ill, asked me if I could post the accounts for the day. I answered that I could, if he would explain to me his method. This he did in a few minutes ; and, as the book keeper has not returned, I have done his work ever since, in addition to my own.

"Perhaps you do not comprehend that the books I was required to keep were the false ones I had heard spoken of."

Mr. Clarkson arose suddenly, and going to the door, said, " Excuse me one moment," and deft the room.

"I'm afraid I'm keeping you too long, sir, said Harrison, anxiously, as the gentleman returned ; " but I am almost through now."

"Oh no!" responded the gentleman, "I'm entirely at your service. I'm quite curious to know what the gentlemen intend to gain by these books while they still retain the genuine ones."

"That is just it, sir. One day, Mr. Grant and the clerk were in the office, supposing all the men had gone to dinner, and got to disputing very angrily on that subject. Mr. Grant wanted to stroy them, but the other wouldn't consent to it. They called each other all kinds of hard names; but at length agreed that the books should be boxed up and sent to a place of security."

"I suppose, then," suggested Mr. Clarkson, that Mr. Ransom wished to hold these as a proof of the villainy of the other, in case he turned against him."

"Yes, sir; and also to prove his own part of the profits, in case they are not found out." "Oh yes! Well, go on."

"I have nothing more to tell, sir; only that I have seized every opportunity to copy a few pages from the real books --enough to compare with the books which will be presented Mr. Kilby, if he should inquire for them

"Are you willing to take your oath that these are correct?" asked Mr. Clarkson, advancing and taking the sheets from the boy's hand.

"I am willing, sir," answered the boy, seriously, "to take my oath that they are correct in dates and figures, and in every particular and respect, as far as I was capable of making them so."

"Well, then, come with me to a magistrate." "What will it be necessary for me to do, sir
