threatening to swing on the shoals on our port side The enemy at once noticed our embarrassed position, and improving the fixed mark afforded by the stoppage, diverted their long range guns for a while from the Monitors upon us. Bang, bang their shot went against the sides almost faster than we could count. Happily the anchor straightened the course of the heaviest practicable charges. ship, and in a few minutes we were again under

We had hardly gained a hundred or so yards upon Fort Sumter, when the ship became once more unmanageable, and the anchor was again let go. The Admiral now had the Monitors in our wake signaled to disregard the movements of the flag-ship, and run past it toward the forts. The two nearest, the Catskill and Nantucket however, from their own heavy, ensteady steering and our own swinging, got foul of us and brushed on the port and starboard side, but the Nahant and Keokuk.

The Ironsides continued almost helpless at the mercy of the tide-now gaining a little, now backing. now striking bottom, now swinging to right and left.
Officers and crew grew restive. The enemy's guns were continually playing upon us. We had not yet returned a single shot. There was, indeed, something or abandonment of the attack known. grand in this scornful disdain of the Rebel fire; but our gunners nevertheless chafed under it. At last. at 4: 30, while swinging on the starboard side, our port broadside came to bear fully on Fort Moultrie, the bar. and Commodore Turner would not let this opportunity "Open port holes," "Aim," "Fire," followed by a severe concussion of the air, and the first and only offensive effort of the Ironsides in the action it utterly impossible to make headway with the ship, the flag-ship, and anchored under the guns of Fort Wagoner. While the Ironsides struggled, a passive mark, with the tide, the other eight iron-clads had one after another become engaged in what will live in history as the most desperate-despite its brief durationnaval action known to mankind. I have already made an attempt to describe the raking, roaring intensity of the concentric fire of the Rebel works. I might fill page after page with descriptive phrases without reflecting anything like the reality of its fury. The facts and figures respecting its effect upon the monitors I give below will convey a better idea of its character than vain word-painting.

Under it the Captains of the Weehawken, Passaic, Montauk, and Patapsco, were working with might and main to come abreast, with their badly steering vessels, off the north west face of the fort, as directed in the order of battle, firing all the while their guns, now at Sumpter then at Moultrie. But they were still under the fire of the north east face, when they discovered three lines of floating obstructions, with another consisting of a row of piles across the whole harber a short distance beyond. They endeavored but found themselves unable to exercise sufficient control over their vessels to do so. While making this attempt the turret of the Passaic was so bent in by a single shot as to make the working of the 11 turret refused altogether to turn, depriving her of all offensive power. The 200 pounder of the Patapsco also became early disabled.

But, aside from these damages to two, the fact that not one of the four could make headway past the batteries, rendered their stay under the heaviest fire useless, and hence turned about and steered back, after having been in concentric range nearly an hour. inflict any damage. On the way up the Patapsco's daring. screw caught in a kind of net work of chains and cable, kept affoat by barrels, and perpendicular by weights. For a while it seemed as though she could not be extricated from the mesh, but in the end worked clear. The Catskill, Nantucket, Nahant and Keokuk had the same experience. When the Catskill and Nantucket got entangled with the Ironsides, the last mentioned steamed ahead of the three others, but all four got into action shortly after each other, and about back. The enemy had by no means spent the force the south. of their fire upon the first four. The increased number of assailants seemed to spur them, on the contrary, into doubling their energies. For nearly half an hour, the scene of action was wrapped in intensified sheets of flame, clouds of smoke, and sprays of water. Then the impassability of the obstructions compelled the last four to follow suit with the first. The Catskill, Nantucket, and Nahant had kept their course half way between Forts Sumter and Moultrie, and received the hottest fire of and replying to both. The Keokuk had stood more to the left, and came within three hundred yards of Fort Sumter, the fire of the whole northeast face of which it seemed to sustain for some time alone, without being able to fire more than three shots in return-from what cause I will show helow

About fifteen minutes before five o'clock, a signal was made from the flagship to cease firing, and withdraw from the enemy's fire. Shortly after five o'clock, the Monitors, followed by the Keokuk, were within hail of the flagship, and the fire of the enemy stopped. In dropping down, the Nantucket aimed a few shots at Fort Wagoner, which were the last fired on our

When the vessels were nearest the obstructions, the pilots made out the ironclad rams Palmetto State and Chicora, with a wooden gunboat, standing toward of the obstructions, they came, however, to a discrect Please mform the office:halt, and did not venture to engage the Monitors.

Upon coming out of range, the hatchways of the Ironsides were opened, and we could once more have a full view of things around us. As I reached the spardeck, the Keokuk was just passing our starboard side, with Captain Rhind limping about the forward turret. A sorry sight she presented. Her sides and turrets showed innumerable holes. She was evidently used up. The Nahant, Patapsco, and Nantucket also passed, and the commanders of each reported more or less damage. The pilot house of the former was badly shattered.

But the full extent of the injuries to the ironclads was not known until their commaders personally re-ported them to the Admiral in the course of the evening. The Keokuk had ninety shots in all-nineteen on the water-line (twelve starboard, and seven port); fifteen in the after turret (five of them through -one Whitworth steel pointed shot remained sticking in the wall); twelve in the forward turret (three of them through); twenty-five on the sloping sides (fifteen starboard, and ten port); eight through sheeting on after turret; ten through smoke stack (seven through, three glanced); four through the boats, and two glanced off the deck; one cut signal staff, and three or four went through the flag.

The New Ironsides was hit between sixty and seventy times, but sustained no material damage. One of the shutters of port five, port side, was knocked off; an eleven inch shell lodged in the how, between the sides and the sand-bags. A shot passed through the smoke stack, and her bulwarks were much shat-

The Weehawken was struck fifty-nine times. The turret was badly dented, and worked with difficulty. Many bolts in the pilot house ind been loosened and driven through.

The Montauk was hit twenty times; the Passaid fifty-eight times. In addition to the damage already stated, her pilot house was much weakened by the loosening and driving through of the bolts. The Nantucket was struck fifty one times, and had her turret stopped twice by shot. The Catskill received about the same number of shots. Both the latter had their decks almost torn open by rifled bolts. The Patapsco was hit between forty and fifty times, nd, besides the disabling of her two hundred pounder Parrott, had her turret much dented, and pilot house weakened. The Nahant was struck eighty fimes and had her pilot house almost broken into pieces

Four men were wounded-one mortally, in it, from munition, the different vessels fired : naides..... 8 rounds. Passaic...... 9 rounds. skilli...... 25 " Nahunt...... 24 " Weehawken ... 26 "

Assuming that one out of every ten Rabel shots struck—a very liberal allowance—it would appear that the enemy fired over four thousand rounds. Three-fourths of these, at least, were discharged while the Monitors and Keokuk were within the converging ranges, that is, in less than three-quarters of an hour, so that it appears the forts and batteries averaged almost two hundred discharges per minute. Their fire was excellently directed. Their gurs were all of heavy calibre, throwing 8, 9, 10, and 11-inch round shot and shell, and 5 and 6-inch rified shot.

The enemy had a few very effective Whitworth guns playing upon us. Several of the steel-pointed olts thrown by them were found inside the Keokuk and upon the decks of several of the iron-clads. The great force with which the Rebel missiles struck and dented, bulged in and broke the decks, sides, turrets and pilot-houses, indicated high velocities from the

In spite of the comparative weakness of our fire. considerable damage was done to the forts. The north-east face of Fort Sumter was marked with eleven holes, plainly visible at our distance of three miles. Some gaps were three feet wide, and looked as though the shot had plowed right through the wall. Two embrasures seemed almost knocked into one. One of our first shot brought down the flagstaff of Fort Moultrie.

I conversed with all the Captains of the iron clads during their meeting on board. Their opinions had got again clear, and headed on in disordered line with but one drift; that it would be folly and sure destruction to renew the attack after to-day's experience, resulting in the total disabling of two (Keokuk and Passaic) and partial of three more (Nahant, Nantucket and Patapsco. The Admiral quietly received their reports, but did not ask for their opinions nor make his decision of the question of the renewal

> Late last evening the whole squadron dropped a mile further down the channel and anchored close to Almost my first look from the spar-deck this mornng, fell upon a sad sight. The Keokuk was sinking She had anchored on the bar during the night. Her crew had been busy ever since last evening trying was made. Shortly after the strong ebb tide rendered to keep her affoat by plugging the holes at her waterline. But at day-break a stiff breeze set the sea and the order was given to drop back. Never was a rolling, rendering their attempts futile. Capt. Rhind command more reluctantly given or obeyed. Deep hoisted a signal of distress at about 7, but it remained chagrin settled upon all. Still, no other course was unnoticed until nearly 8, when the tug Dandelion left, and we slowly steamed back, after signaling to came alongside the sinking craft. Through the strenuthe Monitors to withdraw from the action and johow ous efforts of her captain, Acting Master Barrymore, ous efforts of her captain, Acting Master Barrymore, every soul on board was saved, with a loss, however. of all they had.

The crew were received with lusty cheers on board the Ironsides, and in the course of the morning sent to Port Royal on board the Wissahickon.

The Keokuk went down precisely at 8 10, with her flag flying in eighteen feet of water. In order to prevent the rebels from appropriating the machinery and guns, the wreck will be blown up. The Weehawken lost her raft during the night

In the course of the morning it was washed ashore on Morris Island, and taken possession of by the enemy.

About noon the Admiral had the Captains of the Monitors called together and declared to them his determination to withdraw their vessels from this harbor. As is the habit of his independent mind, he had arrived at this conclusion after cool reflection upon the facts officially reported to him without consultation with any one else. But of course he was gratified with the coincidence of the opinion of his Captains.

To give the order to withdraw from the harbor was undoubtedly the most painful act of the Admito gain the narrow passage left open through the first, ral's long and faithful career in the service of his country. He had to choose between the almost certain destruction of what was left fit for action of the iron-clads and the loss of personal prestige from accepting a repulse as the result of yesterday's attack. inch gun impracticable. A short while after, the He chose the latter, and I say, with all the confidence personal observation can give, the country should thank him for it.

When the fire of the Rebel forts and batteries he was to attack and destroy, in the short time of three quarters of an hour disabled five and weakened all of the iron clads, how could be feel justified in continuing a work requiring in all probability a trial of days of the powers of offence and defence that had failed The motion of the Weehawken was very much im in less than hour?
