CHAPTER VI.

HARRISON'S NEW HOME.

During the sickness and convalescence of their child, Mr. and Mrs. Haven became so much interested in the nurse, that they determined, if she would accept the situation of housekceper in their family, to take a house for the winter, as they had long wished to do. They knew that she was exceedingly unwilling to be separated from Harrison; and, as they intended to offer him a home, they were sure this would be a great inducement for her to consent.

This arrangement was happily accomplished, and Mrs. Danforth was delighted to acknowledge that she owed so comfortable a home to the industry and good conduct of her son.

Harrison went regularly to school; but when at home he was always ready to do anything in the family, and rendered himself so important a part of the household, that Mr. Haven often declared he did not know how they could do without him.

Alfred, as I have already mentioned, was at a boarding-school about twenty miles from the city.

His teachers had more than once notified his father, that unless he would comply with the rules of the house and of the school, he must be dismissed. Mr. Haven had plead with them to allow him to remain, as he knew the discipline would be of great service to the boy. He also used all the influence he possessed with the wavward lad, threatening unless he would yield to authority to deprive him of his allowance and other indulgences.

Alfred promised to amend; but before the first half of the term had expired, he was expelled, one of the ushers being sent with him in disgrace to his father.

If Harrison had not cherished so great a dislike to the character of this boy, Mrs. Danforth would have felt that she must remove him from the house, so debasing did she consider Alfred's influence. Indeed, his impudence and contempt of authority was so trying to his parents that they could hardly endure the annovance of his presence. Too late they learned that unlimited indulgence, without parental restraint, so far from making a child happy, only produces misery for himself, and for all those connected with him.

Finding Harrison so much of a favorite with his parents and sister, Alfred took every opportunity of insulting the boy, sneering at him for being obliged to labor when out of school, often boasting that he had never done an hour's work in his life.

On one of these occasions Mr. Haven was an unseen witness of the treatment to which Harrison was subjected. The boy was blacking a pair of boots, and whistling merrily at his work. " Blackey, take that !" cried Alfred, giving him a kick. "You ought to have a sign out, 'Shoes and whistling done here to order.' I suppose you expect father to set you up in business that way; buy you a stand and half a dozen bottles of " Day & Martin.' "

At first. Harrison seemed inclined to return the kick by a blow upon the face of Alfred with the boot which was stretched on his arm; but, checking himself, went on whistling louder than times my good father repeated to me the words of Solomon, 'The slothful shall be under tribute': The soul of the sluggard desireth and hath nothing; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat': 'But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith and is worse than an in-"But if any provide not for his own, and especially for fidel': 'This we commanded you, that if any would not work, neither shall he eat': 'Slothful-worse than an infidel." ness casteth into a deep sleep, and an idle soul shall suffer hunger': 'He that is slothful in his work, is brother to him that is a great waster.' "I well remember one evening when I had sat with tears in my eyes because my father had treated my lover coolly, that my mother tried to prevail on him to consent to my wishes. Father took down the Bible, and picked out a great many texts similar to those I have repeated, and gave them to me to commit to memory. The next day he met me walking sadly behind the house, and asked me, 'Dare you, Julia, unite yourself with one who lives in constant violation of God's command, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work"?

"I, of course, made many excuses for my absent friend, and said that I knew he wanted to find some steady employment; that he disliked to be out of work as much as any one, but circumstances had not favoured him. He gazed in my flushed face earnestly for a minute, and then said, 'O, my child ! I'm afraid you're bringing sorrow and affliction upon yourself! God's word never has failed, and it never will !' The poor widow covered her face and wept. Oh, how many, many times those prophetic words have come back to me !"

"Father was a miller, and in a prosperous business. Every one of the children had been brought up to labour at some regular employment. About this time he wanted to build an addition to his mill. I noticed that he went. for several days, to the widow Danforth's; but he said nothing to me of his business there. One day he brought home your father in the wagon, and told me that Henry was to put in a certain sum, and become a kind of partner in the business; that he had given his consent, if Henry would work regularly ten hours every day for six months, we might be married. "I was, as you may suppose, very happy, and very sanguine that my lover would do all that my father wished. On account of being near his work he was to board at our house; so that I had opportunity to encourage him when his energies began to flag. Father said nothing, but I noticed that he watched Henry closely; and I was delighted when I found that the cordial. amiable temper of the young partner began to have its effect.

"When I look back I can see that, but for his strict watching, and perhaps my influence, ne would have sold out his share in the mill long before the time expired. But as it was, the season named arrived, and we were married. My father did well by me, and offered to give Henry a larger share of the profits at the end of the year. But, alas! before that time my dear father died, and died too, knowing that all his prophecies for his daughter would be fulfilled. Henry had returned to his old habits of idleness; and even I, sanguine as I had been, began to have fearful misgivings about the future.

"We moved to another town near by, and then to the city, where my poor Henry seemed always to be in search of work; but, when he found it, could never conquer his distaste for regular employment; and so at last he came to fulfil the prophecy of Solomon, 'By much sloth-

Alfred grew irritated : and, calling his companion by some of the vilest names he could string together, he started forward to strike him, when his uplifted arm was seized firmly by his father.

"Filthy boy !" he exclaimed, in great anger, "for once you shall feel the power of the rod." He then commanded Harrison to go for his horsewhip; and, notwithstanding the violent struggles of his child, administered a sound chastisement. Then, after consulting with his Remember, my son, any work is safe upon which wife, he set out at once in search of a gentleman who had recommended a situation for his son.

Back of the dining-hall was a small apartment which Mrs. Haven called the housekeeper's room. In this apartment the mother and son could be as retired as in their own home. There, after the duties of the day were ended, Harrison sat with his books and slate, busy with his school lessons, or receiving instruction from his mother. Occasionally a timid knock announced the coming of Ella, who liked nothing better than to sit by the side of her old nurse and listen to her words of advice to her boy.

Mrs. Danforth seldom spoke of her husband, and seemed generally cheerful and happy; but, one evening when Harrison went to her room, he found her weeping bitterly. She had been allowing herself the luxury of looking over some letters received from her husband just before their marriage, and this had brought the trials of her wedded life most forcibly to mind.

"My dear boy," said she, trying to compose herself, "I have long been considering whether you were old enough to profit by the story of vour father's life. While you remember so vividly the scenes connected with his last days, I would impress upon you the cause of all his' -she hesitated-" of all, I mean, that is painful for us to think of. Your father, as perhaps you know, was an only child. His mother loved him so fondly that she could not bear the thought of his enduring any hardship. His father was an industrious man, and wished his son to be taught to work. He used to set him a daily task before he went to his own toil; but the boy would cry that it was too hard for him; that he could not handle the axe, it was so heavy; that the hoeing made his back ache; and so his too indulgent mother performed the work for him, in addition to her own hard labour. Many and many a time posed had been done by his son, while he passed the hours in idleness of in play. As he grew up, and this could no longer be concealed from his father, he complained of want of strength to do hard work, and begged to be placed in a store in the village. Here he prided himself upon being dressed better than any boy in town; and his frank, handsome face and funny jokes caused him to be liked by all. In this business he might have succeeded, for he was acknowledged to be a good salesman; but soon he grew tired of the confinement : it was too much like labour. He grew more and more inattentive to his business. until he failed to give satisfaction to his employer, and was dismissed from the place. From this time, for the next four years, he was constantly changing from one employment to another, never continuing but a short period at any one thing, but always finding some reason in the heaviness of the work sufficient to satisfy his weak-minded mother. His father remonstrated again and Both the Ointment and Pills should be used in the again; but finally said he had done with the boy, and would never advise him more, let him Ban do what he would. I suppose nothing would Char have satisfied her but to have him entirely exempt from care, and ride about in a coach. She often told him he looked too much like a gentleman to our with his hands.

"At length his father died, and the property was divided between the mother and son. We was divided between the mother and son. We had been attached to each other about a year, I thinking of nothing but the easy good nature and the haudsome appearance of my lower; but fulness the building decayeth; and through idleness of the hands, the house droppeth through.' "You will see now, my dear son, why I have been so earnest to have you establish in early life a habit of industry, and to cultivate a taste for daily, honest labor. No matter what employment you have, if it is honorable employment.

Remember your little verse-'For Satan finds some mischief still, For idle hands to do.

you can ask the blessing of your Heavenly Father.."
