PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF A PRIVATE GOVERNESS.

CHAPTER IV.

IN WHICH I LEFT MY FIRST SITUATION IN LONDON.

It is well to hope on, it is well to hope ever : Though the sun set to night, will it rise again never? Though some bubbles it gilds with a joy that must perish, 'Tis the sunshine of life, and its beams I will cherish. G. G. Rowe.

It was not until I had thrown myself on my bed to get an hour's rest after the auxiety and fatigue of the past night, that I remembered anything about the letter I had taken away from the bridge. But after this I took it out of my pocket, and as it was addressed to no one, I read it. It was as follows :--

"Whoever you are who may read this, learn the fate of one of the unhappiest of mortals. Having ruined myself at the gaming-table ; having incurred debts of honour that it is impossible for me to pay ; without love to kin or kind ; with out belief in any hereafter ; without any fear of death; and being wearied, thoroughly wearied of life, I have written this before playing my last game; resolved that if I lose I shall first take from Westminster-bridge. There may be those that love me; but they will be better without me. I know there are those who hate me; and these will not regret me. Life has lost its charm. The memory of past sunshine makes my present pall the blacker. Better be food for fishes or the car- centical Society of Great Britain. rion crow than the victim, the dupe of such as I t

Here followed his name and address in full. Involuntarily I fell on my knees, and lifted my heart up to heaven in deepest gratitude, that the gambler's purpose had been, at least, for this time, prevented. With a throbbing head and beating heart I again sought sleep; nor did I seek in vain, for the gentle nurse soon steeped

Would it be wise or kind to show this letter to Mrs. Huddersfield? I asked myself again and again, without being able to return a satisfactory answer. Could it do anything but harrow up her feelings? Would it not deepen her wound to find that her husband was without love to kin or nett; and upwards of one hundred others. A. M. DINSMORE, kind? Yet, on the other hand, might she not be able to shape her future conduct with regard to her husband better if she knew the real state of his mind, as the letter displayed it?

With these conflicting thoughts I entered the breakfast-room, which Mrs. Huddersfield had reached before me. Her eyes were red with weeping; melancholy sat on her white forehead, and the very tones of her voice sounded like the wailings of an Æolian harp. The children, of course, were not present; and neither of us had any appetite.

"Miss Tyler, you have seen too much and have been too kind," said Mrs. Huddersfield, " for me to wish for a moment to conceal anything D from Liverpool: Blankets. Sealskin Cloths, Linseys, from you. If I was silent in the cab; it was be- and Whirlpool Cloths. cause I felt I had no right to burden you with more just then. And yet I have no friend but you; and, selfish creature that I am, what burdens others gives relief to me." I felt too deeply for utterance. She saw, however, I sympathized with her, and she went on. "You saw the dreadful act he intended to perpetrate on the bridge. Well, I will not-cannot tell you the arguments I used to dissuade him, but I thought I saw signs of feeling; and as we and single soles, of superior quality. RUBBER BOOTS AND SHOES, of the best English and American manufactures, all sizes, at an exceedingly walked to the station, and I assured him of un- low price. His arm, which I was determined to hold twitched less con-multiply the apply in torus 1 and 1 a vulsively; he spake in tones more natural; he reasoned on his actions more coherently; he mentioned the names of the dear childrenat least, so I thought-more lovingly, and there was a greater disposition in him to inquire, if he lived, how were we all to be provided for? In the pocket-book I found in his desk, there were two bank-notes of £100 each. These I had with when he has reached some foreign shore, where | vanced," &c. he will be away from these hawks and vultures, he has promised to write to me." The very glow-worm's light, in the absence of people are told what it is. The Recipe is published around all other, is not to be distinguised. So I thought and felt. Little as the light of hope was that illumined the darkness of Mrs. Huddersfield's heart, them. I would not for a universe have robbed her of the thought-"He will write when he has reached sea now lay before her!

out servants. I can look after baby, and Bell can look after little Percy; and we can be happy, mamma, until papa comes back arain." Can we part ....... scenes with which memory associates hours of pleasantness, and feel no regret, even when the change is for the better ? How will that regret be deepened when the change is for the worse! There was none of us who had not some pleasing association with the home we were leaving; for although there were here (as there will be everywhere) some clouds and thorns, yet we had much sunshine, and many roses. Who, then, would expect that, from the kitchen-maid to the mistress, there should be no sad hearts during that terrible day of packing and preparing to wish good-bye ? Our comfort under such circumstances is, that while the clouds are dropping their sorrow they are passing on at the same time. Thus the grief of parting came and went, and a short note I received from Mrs. Huddersfield, about a fortnight afterwards, told that a hopeful spirit was looking on the bright side of the dark cloud that enveloped her. [To be continued.]
