A FRIEND IN NEED.

"Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not."
—Prov. xxvii. 1.

There was not a happier mother in the village than Mrs. Peters, nor a better son than her Robin. She had trained up her child in the way he should go, and it was now his delight to walk in it; she had not shrunk from correcting his faults, and he loved her the better for the correction; she had taught him from the Bible his duty towards his God, and from the same pages he had learned his duty towards his mother. It was a pleasant sight on the Sabbath morning, to see them walking up the little pathway which led to the church, the feeble parent leaning on the strong, healthy son, who carried her Bible and prayer-book for her. Mrs. Peters never had the slightest feeling of envy towards those who appeared above her in the world, she would have changed places with any one. "They may have richer, fine houses, broad lands," she would say; "but who has a son like mine?"

On the Sunday afternoon, however, Robin did not accompany his mother to church. Perhaps you may suppose that, after his hard work all the week, he thought that he needed a little rest, or amusement; that you might have found him at "the idle corner" of the village, joining in the sports of younger companions, and that he considered, like too many, alas! that having given the Sabbath morning to religion, he might do what he pleased with the rest of the day. Let us follow Robin Peters in his Sunday pursuits, and see where, after partaking of dinner with his mother, he bends his willing steps.

Over the common, through the wood, up the steep hill side! It matters not to him that the way is long; that in winter part of the road scarcely deserves the name of one at all, being almost impassable from slough and snow. Cheerfully he hastens along, with a light springing step; sometimes shortening the way with a hymn, or gazing around on the endless variety of nature, and lifting up his heart to nature's God! There is surely something very pleasant that awaits Robin Peters at the end of his walk, that he always should take it in this one direction; that he never give it up, fair weather or foul; and look so happy while pursuing his way!

He stops at last at the door of a poor little hovel, built partly of mud, and thatched with straw. The broken panes in the single window have been patched with paper by Robin's hand, instead of being, as formerly, stuffed up with rags; but either way they speak of poverty and want. By the miserable little fire, which could scarcely be kept up at all, but for the sticks which Robin has supplied, sits a poor old man, almost bent double by time, the long hair falling on his wrinkled brow, his hand trembling, his eye dim with age. But there is a kindling pleasure even in that dim eye, as he hears a well-known rap at the door; and warm is the press of that thin, trembling hand, as it returns the kindly grasp of Robin!

First there are inquiries for the old man's health, and these take some time to answer; for it is a relief to the suffering to pour out long complaints—it is a comfort to them if one kindly ear will listen with interest and patience. Then the contents of Robin's pockets are emptied upon the broken deal box, which serves at once as chest of drawers and table to the old man, and a seat to the visitors, "few and far between," who find their way to the hovel on the hill. The present brought by the youth varies from week to week. He has little to give, but he always brings something to ease out old Will Aymer's parish allowance: sometimes it is a little tea from his mother; perhaps a pair of warm socks, knitted by herself; or a part of his own dinner, if he has nothing else to bring to the poor and aged friend of his father.

After the depths of the pockets had been duly explored, Robin, seated on the box, very close to the old man, for Aymer was extremely hard of hearing, repeated to him, in a loud tone of voice, as much of the morning's sermon as he could remember. He whom age and infirmities kept from the house of God, thus from the kindness of a youth, every week received some portion of spiritual food. But most did he enjoy when Robin opened the Bible, for, poor as Aymer was, he was provided with that, and in the same loud, distinct voice read the blessed words which the dim eyes of his friend could no longer see.

After the holy book was closed, it was long before Robin found that he was able to depart. Aymer liked so much to hear all about his friends and his neighbours, everything which passed in the village in which the old man had once lived. It was something for him to think over during the long, lonely week, to prevent his feeling himself quite shut out from the living world. And Robin had not only to speak, but to listen; and this, notwithstanding the deafness of old Aymer, was perhaps the harder task of the two. Not only the poor man's sight, but his memory also was failing; his mind was growing weak and childish with age, and his tedious and oft repeated tales were not grounded on Christian love! And so late afternoon of the Sabbath passed with Robin Peters, and he returned weary but happy to his home, to enjoy a quiet, holy evening with his mother. He had poured sweetening into a bitter cup; he had followed the footsteps of his compassionate Lord; and he had obeyed the precept given in the Scriptures, "Thine own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not."

After what has been written it is scarcely necessary to add that the life of Robin was a happy one. At peace with God, and at peace with man, earning his bread by honest industry, in debt to none, in enmity with none, blessed with friends, cheerful spirits, and excellent health, he was far happier than many who wear a crown. But though religion can support the Lord's people under trials, it does not prevent their having to undergo them like others, and after several years he had been spent in comfort and peace, a cloud was gathering over the home of Robin.

On Saturday evening he returned from his work, complaining of headache and a pain in his throat. Mrs. Peters concluded that he had taken a chill, and advising him to go early to rest, prepared for him some simple remedy, which she trusted would "set all to rights." Robin took what she gave him with thanks, but he seemed strangely silent that evening, and sat with his brow resting upon his hand, as though oppressed by a weight in his head. The fond mother grew anxious, who can help being so when her earthly happiness rests upon one! She felt her son's hand feverish and hot; she was alarmed by the burning flush on his cheek, and proposed begging the doctor to call. At first Robin objected to this; he hardly ever knew sickness in his life, the medical man lived at some distance, and the night was closing in. In the malady of the body, but oh! how much more in those of the soul!

Another hour passed, and the fever and pain of the sufferer appeared to increase. Again the mother anxiously proposed to send for the doctor; and this time Robin made no opposition. "Perhaps it might be as well," he faintly said. "I did not like making you uneasy by saying it before, but there has been some of that fever up at the farm."

The words struck like a bolt into the mother's heart. There was not an hour's moment to delay; she rushed out to the door of a neighbor, and begged the doctor to call (for it was often remarked that the doctor and her son never parted).

The words struck like a bolt into the mother's heart. There was not an hour's moment to delay; she rushed out to the door of a neighbor, and begged the doctor to call (for it was often remarked that the doctor and her son never parted).

Robin in the meantime retired to his bed, feeling unable to sit up longer. The symptoms of his disorder soon became more alarming, a scarlet glow spread over his frame, his pulse beat high, his temples throbbed; and his mother, in an agony of fear which she could only calm by prayer, sat watching for the arrival of the doctor.

Dr. Merton had just set down to a very late dinner with two old school-fellows of his, whom he had not met for years; and they promised themselves a very pleasant evening together. "Nothing like old friendships, and old friends!" he said gaily, as the covers were removed from the steaming dishes, and they saw before them a comfortable repast, which the late hour and twenty miles' ride had given all a hearty appetite to enjoy. "Nothing like old friends, old stories, old recollections!—we shall seem to live our school-days over again, and feel ourselves boys once more!"

There was a ring at the door-bell, a very loud ring, there was impatience and haste in the sound of it. "I hope that's nothing to disturb our sociable evening," said Dr. Merton, who, having placed the plates of both his friends, was just placing a slice of roast beef on his own. He paused, with the carving knife and fork still in his hand, as his servant entered the room.

"Please, sir, here's Tom Grange come in haste from Redburn, and he says that Robin Peters is taken very ill, and his mother begs to see you directly."

The knife and fork were laid down, perhaps a little unwillingly, and the doctor arose from his chair.

"Why, Merton, you're not going now!" cried one of his companions.

"Just wait till after dinner," said the other.

"Excuse me," Mrs. Peters is not the woman to send me such a message without sufficient cause. I have known her and her son too for many a long year, and they shall not find me fail them in their trouble."

So the doctor put on his great-coat, took down his hat, begged his friends to do justice to the good cheer provided, and left them, if I must own it, with no small regret, to sally forth in that cold, wintry night, tired and hungry as he was. He walked fast, both to save time, and to keep himself warm; but his pace would have been even more rapid had he known the agonizing anxiety, increasing every minute, with which his arrival was expected. The door, as he reached it, was opened by the widow, who looked upon him with the breathless earnestness of one who expects to hear a sentence of life or death.

A very short examination of the sufferer enabled the doctor to pronounce that his case was one of decided scarlet fever. Some one must sit up with him and watch him; that night; a messenger should instantly be sent with the remedies required; the doctor would himself call the next morning.

"You do not think my boy—very ill, sir?" faltered the mother, folding her hands and fixing her eyes upon Dr. Merton with an expression of much grief, which touched the kind man to the heart.

"He is ill, I cannot deny that; but keep a good heart, he has youth and a fine constitution in his favour; and I need not remind you, my friend, to apply for help to Him in whose hands are the issues of life and of death."
