THE MIDNIGHT PRAYER MEETING.

The storm-king vents his fury,
The waves run mountains high;
Exposed to all the tempest,
The gallant vessels lie.
"But safely rides the London!"
(A sanguine one exclaims)
"The best built ocean steamer."
That ever sailed down the Thames:
Vain boast, she now lies helpless;
And filled with sore dismay,
With one accord they're gathered,
To hear Christ's servant pray.
Proud men are bending low;
The scoffers taunts are stilled,
And with forebodings fearful,
The stoutest heart is filled.
Here too is gentle woman,
And helpless infancy,
With hands upraised and trembling,
Clasped in mute agony:
In fervent tones good Draper
Prays, that converting grace
May copiously be granted,
Ere they meet death's embrace.
A look of calm entreaty,
Is resting on his brow,
As with his God he wrestles,
To send salvation now.
Oh, ye who dwell in safety,
Know nothing of such prayer
As rose that night to heaven,
Mid terror and despair;
But the all-pitying Saviour,
Looked through the midnight gloom,
And heard those earnest pleadings,
From out that living tomb,
And in Divine compassion,
To his redeemed ones said
Amid the howling tempest—
"Thy I, be NOT AFRAID!"

LIZZIE.

MARION'S TREAT.

"Oh dear!" sighed poor widow Stone, toward the close of a long weary day, "how I wish it were time for Marion to get home from school! Why, it is past the hour," she added, glancing in through the open door at the clock in her little back room. "Where can the child be staying?"
Just then a customer entered the shop, and the weary woman was obliged to rise and wait upon her, still holding in her arms the heavy, fretful infant, who would not be put on the floor for a moment. The lady was in quest of a supply of small wares—tapes, pins and needles—and at least half an hour was consumed, and a dozen heavy boxes were lifted from the shelves, ere she was seated. Meanwhile, poor little Carl kept up his low cry, and the lady—could she have been a mother!—glanced impatiently toward him, muttering something about the folly of "people attempting to wait upon a shop and tend a baby at the same time!"
At last the purchases were made, and as the widow deposited in her drawer the trifle received in payment, she sighed again a weary sigh, and murmured, "Folly, indeed! Does she suppose I must struggle along in this way if I could help it?" Poor widow Stone! others beside her haughty customer had blamed her for undertaking as much as she did. "If she must keep a shop," said they, "why not have that great girl of hers at home to help her, instead of keeping her at a pay school?" There were few indeed to sympathize in the mother's earnest desire to continue to her children the advantages of a school.

Eight months had passed since her husband died, leaving her with the support of four children upon her hands—little Carl being then scarcely two months old. The father had been an industrious carpenter, with full employment, but a long illness had drawn upon his savings, so that at his death there was barely enough remaining to the widow to stock the little shop, which seemed then the only way open to her of obtaining a support for her family.
Tom and Willie, sturdy, good-natured little fellows, of the ages of six and eight years, attended the public school close by; but Marion, the eldest child, now nearly twelve, had been placed by her, shortly before his illness, at an excellent select school in the neighbourhood. Her intelligence and promise had been his delight and pride, and the widow had resolved to spare no effort or self-denial to carry out his intention of giving her a good solid education.
Another half-hour passed before Marion entered, her bright face flushed with exercise and pleasure. "O mother," she cried, eagerly, "I've so much to tell you!"
"But Marion, are you so late?" said the mother, in a tone of remonstrance—"you do not know how much I have needed you."
"Well, I am sorry," replied Marion,—"I just stopped to tell Nellie Raines about to-morrow, and I suppose I stayed longer than I meant to."
"To-morrow! what then?" asked her mother, hastily. "I hope, child, you have not been making any plans for to-morrow, for I've been relying all the week on your being at home to help me on Saturday."
"Oh! but, mother dear, let me only tell you what a treat Miss Thompson has planned for us, and I'm sure you will not say 'No'! The girls are all to meet at her house to-morrow morning early, and we are to go over to N— across the ferry, and then by the stage coach to Mr. Goodsell's, a friend of hers who has such beautiful grounds, mother, and such a lovely garden, every one says! He invited her to bring her scholars, and told her he should see that we had a good luncheon when we came—we'll have strawberries and cream, I know! Won't it be fine! Only say I may go, and I'll promise to work every minute out of school, as hard as a woman, now you'll see!" and the eager child threw her arms around her mother's neck, half smothering her with kisses.
"But my dear child, such a trip will cost something, and indeed I have no money to spare."
"Oh, that's all arranged!" cried Marion. "Kate Ellis whispered to me when Miss Thompson was talking about it—I suppose she thought I looked a little sad, for I didn't think you could spare the money;—she said I needn't be troubled about the fare, for she had money enough for us both—her uncle had just given her some money to spend as she pleased. Wasn't she thoughtful, mother?—I'm everybody kind! Now I'm sure you will say I may go!" and Marion danced about the room, swinging her school-bag for very glee!

The mother smiled faintly as she replied, "Of course you shall go, child! I shouldn't have the heart to keep you from such a treat, if I had twice as much as I have to do! But now take the baby and try to amuse him; he's so fretful I am really afraid he is going to be sick; and there comes the boys—I must mend poor Tommy's jacket, for I shall have no chance to-morrow; and there is some one in the shop."
