UPWARDS AND DOWNWARDS."

The soul of the sluggard desireth and hath nothing ; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat."—Prov. xiii. 4.

Meantime another opening was made for Willie to rise to a more comfortable position in life. Mr. Baynes, a fruiterer, who lived near the square, and had occasionally employed him on little er rands, and always found him diligent and steady, was suddenly obliged to dismiss his own errandboy at an hour's notice for coming home in a state of intoxication.

This is exceedingly inconvenient; what am I to do till I can supply his place?" said the old fruiterer to his wife as she stood piling the rosy apples in the window.

'I should say, my dear," she replied, without passing in her occupation, " that we might have in the little sweeper Willie just for a few days till we get another boy to suit us. He looks so clean and neat that we need not be ashamed of him; and I believe that we might trust him with the

"HI trust him," said her husband; "honesty is written on his face; and my friend at the Ragged School, who sees him every evening, says that he does not know a more promising boy.

So Willie, to his great joy, was engaged for a week at a shilling a day, and his dinner provided. This seemed riches to the poor sweeper boy; and never was an apple missed from a basket, never was the messenger too late or too long. The shop, to clean which was a part of his work, had never looked so beautifully neat. At the end of that week Willie was able to change his silver for a piece of gold, the first which he had ever touched in his life.

"I've not found any boy to suit me vet," said the fruiterer to his wife as they sat at the breakfast-table together. " I believe that we must hire Willie Deane for another week."

"Well, my dear," she replied, as she poured out the tea, " I don't see why we should not keep him altogether; he's honest, sober, industrious and clean, and the most willing boy that ever I met with. Let's take him into the house. and give him wages ; we ought to know when we're well served, my dear."

Willie's heart bounded for joy when the old fruiterer gave him the offer of the situation. It was not the thought of exchanging the hardships and privations of his present life, his miserable garret shared with others, his wretched food, barely sufficient to maintain him in health, for the comforts of a respectable home, but the hope that, as he would now have something certain for his work, he might support his blind sister himself! He hastened to Mrs. Clark, and telling her of the prospect opening before him, asked her whether, if he placed the whole of his wages in her hands, a small sum for washing only excepted, she would agree to take charge of his little sister. The sum, as he owned, was very small, but Ellie might perhaps learn to do something for her own maintenance; he would teach her in the evenings, which he was to have to himself, and his darling sister would always be near him.

Mrs. Clark hesitated, while Willie looked anxionsly into her face for a reply. " We must at least wait," she replied, "till your quarter's wages become due. I'm in debt at this moment eighteen shillings for coals and for rent, and "But I can pay something now!" cried Willie eagerly, laying a bright gold sovereign upon the table, the fruit of months of self-denial and toil. The sight of the gold was enough; it seemed twice as much to the poor woman in her present distress as the same sum in small weekly payments would have been. She agreed instantly to receive poor Ellie, and to take care of her as if she were her own daughter; and at once prepared to accompany Willie to the poorhouse to claim and bring back his beloved little sister.

Oh! could the Queen on her throne feel happier than that poor boy as he went on his errand of love I What mattered it to him that November's fog was hanging over the dreary streets, that the air was damp and cold, and that a life of humble toil was before him still! There was such sunshine in his breast, such hope and joy in his spirit; the gift of a fortune could not have brought him a keener sense of pleasure than the thought that, by the labour of his hand, the aweat of his brow, he could now earn a living for his

As Willie approached with rapid steps the gloomy portal, at which, some months before, he had stood so desolate and sad, he overtook one whom he instantly recognized as his old feilow sweeper, Sam Higgins. The good clothes of the latter had been pawned for bread; his bare head and teet, his hollow sunken eyes, the air of misemy the appearance of dirt which he wore, told at once the tale of the sluggard. "Are you going to the house too?" drawled the unhappy boy in a husky tone. "I ca'nt stand another winter out o' doors, so I'm going in just for a while. But you don't look as though you had come to that," he added, eyeing Willie Deane from head to foot. "What brings you to the poor-house door ?"

"I come to take out my sister," replied Willie, suppressing his own joy that it might not add to the pain of one who was now driven to ask rollef from the parish. Truly the words of heavenly wisdom had been verified in the two boys, "The soul of the sluggard desireth and bath nothing; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat !"

Oh, Willie! if you only knew how happy I am, was the exclamation of the little blind orphan, as again she was pressed to her brother's heart, again was restored to the outer world from the cheerless gloom of the patper's abode. Those words repaid Willie for all his toil, all his privations and the language of his thankful heart was, "Bless the Lord, O my soul I and all that is within me bless his holy name!"

Very happy was Willie as every evening, after the duties of the day were done, he sought Mis-Clark's humble dwelling. While Ellie's little hand was locked in his, and Mrs. Clark laid aside her work to listen, he would read to them both from the Word of God, or join in the sweet evening hymn. He taught his sister also the basket making art; and blind as she was, the patient little girl in this soon excelled her instructor. It was her delight to show him how busy she had been all the day; and a ready sale for her baskets was found, for Mrs, Baynes, the fruiterer's wife, bought them for her shop, and took a kindly in-terest in the orphan. Many an old piece of dress she laid saide for the child—many little presents of fruit or of tea found their way to the cellar of Mrs. Clark; and soon that cellar was exchanged Mrs. Clark; and soon that cellar was exchanged for a comfortable room, as Ellie's gains were united to her brother's. It is said that "God helps them who help themselves;" and we may often add, that man does so willingly also. Far frombeing a burden to her kind friend, Ellie became her comfort and support. She nursed her in sickness with a daughter's care, was ever ready to share with her last crust; and neither Willie nor his sister ever forgot that in the first step which he had made in his upward path, her kindness had helped him on.

Nor did Willie omit, by constant practice in evening to improve himself in those useful resolution, but Willie was one who never has from work. He even rose before sunrise, he might pursue his studies without enching on that time which belonged to his retail, on the impaired. The early visits to Covent Garden market were too much for his strength; he needed more rest and repose. Feeling himself qualified to undertake this part of the business, Willie offered, though with some hesitation, his services, Mr. Baynes smiled kindly, but evidently enter-tained his doubts that the youth's abilities were equal to his good will. It was not probable that a sweeper, taken from the streets should know how to conduct the business of a shop. An opportunity was, however, soon afforded to Willie o prove how useful he could make himself in a bigher position, and that his head could work as well as his hands.

Willie had been for three years in the

It so happened, that one morning a lady entered the shop to buy, when neither the fruiterer nor his wife were in it, the former having been taken suddenly unwell. Willie would not disturb them by calling them down, he slipped behind the counter himself, served the lady with such intelligence, drew up the bill so correctly, and performed his new part so well, that from that day his employers regarded him in another light, and felt convinced that he could give valuable assistance to his master. In a very short time Willie had quite changed his position, another boy was hired to supply his former place, and all the chief business, whether of buying or selling, was committed to the charge of young Deane. The aged fruiterer with confidence left everything in his hands, and, as with the pious Joseph, God made all that he did to prosper. Custom increased, the business extended, and Mr. Baynes was gencrous and honest enough to give due credit to his active, intelligent assistant. The salary of Willie was first increased, then doubled, till at length the fruiterer, feeling his own powers decaying, and having no one to succeed him in the business, took the once friendless sweeper boy nto partnership, and placed him in a position of espectability and comfort beyond any to which his hopes had dared to aspire,

And now that Willie was in the way to grow ich, dearly he loved to retrace every step in the difficult but upward path by which he, through God's blessing on his industry, had risen. With especial gratifude he remembered the Ragged School at which he had gained knowledge more precious than gold. He aided it from his purse, and, though his time was by far too much occurpied to enable him to visit it during the week, every Sunday evening he devoted to repaying his debt as far as he could by teaching where he had

One night as Willie was returning from the chool, on turning a corner, he heard a confused sound of scuffling, and voices raised in excitement or anger, and quickening his steps, be found a small crowd assembled round a man who had ust been caught in the act of picking a pocket. policeman's hand was on the collar of the thief, scape was impossible, he was about to be dragged off to a felon's jail!

"This isn't the first time; you'll not get off so easy now," said the policeman.

"He's a reg'lar jail bird; he'll come to the gallows at last," cried the woman who had been robbed, " that's the end of the course of such as

At that moment the crowd divided a little, Willie caugh: a moment's glimpse of the prisoner's haggard face as the moon shone full upon it. It was several years since he had seen it last, vet he recognised it still, -it was the face of the Sluggard who would not work, whom idleness had driven to want, and whom want had driven to crime, -it was the face of the wretched Sam

Dear young reader, the choice is before ye now, which will you decide upon taking, the upward course of the diligent, or the downward path of the sluggard?

But oh! temember, above all things, that however great the reward of industry may be here, there is one thing needful, compared with which all the goods of this life are as dross. Be diligent first in the work of the soul, seck first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, while not slothful in business, let your chief desire be always to be serving the Lord. For though the hafd working man may appear to prosper, though money may increase in the till, com in the garner, and comforts in the home, that still is a downward path, whatever the world may call it, which leads us not upwards day by day to the eternal man sions of Heaven!

Mr. J. Chaloner takes this opportunity of making his acknowledgments to Physicians, patients, and the public, for the confidence placed in him, as well as of their generous patronage of the past year.

In the preparation of prescriptions, &c., he has had a long experience—a most important matter—as new features are constantly being presented. He is most careful in beeping none but the finest quality Medicines, and importa direct from the celebrated house of Treacher & Co., Lindon. He has taken the pre-aution of keeping medicines for prescriptions in case separate from the retail department—Prisons having a distinct place. It always has been his endeavor to give satisfaction in this branch of his business, so that the public may send their prescriptions with entire confidence that they will be justly prepared.
