

THE MIDNIGHT PRAYER 1866.

her face she thought of the wicked enticements he used to keep his victims.

"Your husband can remember, I suppose," exclaimed Hobbs, angrily, "and if I am not paid soon, you must take the consequences."

With a horse still over her head, Fanny had contrived to get along. She feared at no distant day it might be drunk away, and she well might read a creditor like Hobbs. The poor mother was cowed.

"I will talk with Silas about it," she said humbly. "What would you allow him?"

"Oh, I shan't be hard," said the hard old man; "send the boy to me," and Hobbs was not so sorry to leave. He could meet the faithful wails and reeling idiocy of the wretched man who frequented his bar, but the presence of a stricken woman alarmed his conscience.

When Silas came home his mother told him. "Never, mother, never!" exclaimed Silas; "never will I go and deal ruin to my father, or anybody's father. No liquor shall pass through my hands. Why, mother, I am a soldier in the cold water army."

"If father gives you the decenter, you'd have to go and buy some," said his brother.

"Never!" repeated Silas.

"Then father would beat you," said little Ann, shrinking.

"I would be licked to death rather than break my pledge," said Silas.

"Obey your parents," said his mother; for the mother's spirit was altogether crashed, and she was ready to counsel and compromise rather than arouse the brutal rage of the husband and the father. Silas did not believe in compromising with wickedness, but he said nothing.

That evening James Farmer came home and told Silas to run down to Hobbs' and bring home the decenter. His mother trembled, but Silas took his cap and walked away. He entered the shop as the old man was filling it.

"You are Silas Farmer, I suppose. Well, I want you in my shop," said Hobbs, in a tone which was meant to be pleasant.

"I came for the decenter," said the boy.

"And I want you in my shop," cried the old man testily, putting it on the counter.

"I cannot come, sir," replied Silas, firmly.

"I a soldier in the cold water army, and I cannot be in the shop where my father was made a unkind."

Without stopping further, Silas seized the decenter and went off, for he was a soldier in the cold water army. He ran to a neighbouring well in the green grass which grew round it—for everything looks fresh and green where pure water is poured out the destroying liquor. Drawing a bucket of water, he carefully rinsed the decenter; then filling it with water, fresh and sparkling, he bottled it up and went home.

"Father," said the brave boy, entering the room where his effebled parent was about dressing, "I have brought you some good wholesome drink, such as God made; and it is I could bring you, because I am a soldier in the cold water army."

"A soldier in what?" said the father, looking up with his bleared eye.

"In the cold water army, father. We are fighting against wicked King Drunkenness; and, father, do come and join our ranks; do, father."

There was something in the almost agonizing earnestness of his son that touched James Farmer's heart. "Do, father," rang in his ears the whole night. True, he gruffly motioned the boy away; but there were other things that he did not motion away so easily. His mind was so moist, and he had nothing to stupify it—nothing to moisten his parched lips and burning tongue—nothing to quench his craving thirst but the cold water in his well-filled decenter. The first best he described in the grey early dawn was decenter. He grasped it with his trembling hand. No hot liquor fumes quickened his senses. He was longed for a "drink." Again he looked at the decenter. No hope there—it was only water, water. He glared round the room. He changed was everything in that once happy home—everything else but the glass decenter. And what a long train of misery had it uncoiled in his family! As he looked at it, vipers and serpents, hissing and stinging, seemed crawling from between his feet with cruel mockings. That awful delirium, the curse of the drunkard, was dripping over the fine, strong frame of James Farmer. He shouted aloud, "Drink, drink, drink!"

For days and nights did Fanny and her son couch by his bed, and bathe his hot brow and cool burning tongue with cold water. "Do, father," came first to his mind when it began to stir up. "O my God, help me!" cried the man. "Almighty Saviour help me to keep my prayer, he, as Silas, true to his soldier duty, brought the cold water pledge to his father's bedside.

In large sprawling letters, James wrote his prayer, and the family knelt down, while the minister prayed for forgiving mercy, and grace to strengthen him in days to come.

Here, father," said Silas, going to the closet in the solemn service was over, "here is the water filled with fresh cold water; will you seal your pledge to total abstinence by a glass of this wholesome drink?"

"Oh, let us smash that decenter," cried little Ann.

"And bury the pieces," added Freddy.

"From our sight for ever," said Fanny the her.

That is all which is left of our first housekeeper, Fanny. Let it stand always filled with water, a witness of my reform, as it was the companion of my fall, and the penitent father. Let there it stands, an abiding memorial of sad bettered and brightened.
