UPWARDS AND DOWNWARDS.

"The soul of the sluggard desireth and hath nothing; but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat."—Prov. xiii. 4. Good-bye, Ellie, dear,-bless you!" cried Willie Deane, with a choking voice, as he embraced his little blind sister again and again at the gloomy door of the poor-house. "Come, no more of this !" said the parish-officer, laying his hand on the shoulder of the sobbing girl, who clung closer and closer to her brother, the only tie now left to her in the wide world. They had that afternoon followed the remains of their father to a pauper's nameless grave; and though the only mourning worn by the barefooted, ragged children was a little bit of old crape, lent by a pitying neighbour, in the hearts of both there was deep, deep mourning, and all the greater since they were now to be separated. Willie, as a boy " quite able to work," though his wan face told of hardship and hunger, was left to make his own way in the world; while Ellie, whose blindness made her perfectly helpless, was removed to the shelter of the poor-house.

" Oh! we shall never, never meet again, and you are all that is left me now! My heart will break!" cried the little girl between her sobs. " No, no; trust in God, darling, we shall meet again! I will work early and late; but I will find some means to support you! We shall yet gain our bread by honest industry—we shall, Ellie, dear, only trust in God!" And so they parted; and the orphan boy, needing only too much for himself the comfort which he had been trying to give to another, stood for some minutes gazing at the door which had been closed behind his fair-haired sister with a feeling of utter desolation. He wished, then tried to repress the wish, lest it should be sinful in the sight of his Maker, that he could lay his weary head where his father slept, and forget all his sorrows in the quiet grave. "But no," he thought, "I must live—I must labour for her. God may yet have a work for even me to do : life's long day of toil is before me, and then, oh, how sweet will be rest!" Willie carried back the crape to Mrs. Clark, who had been the friend of his father in better times; a very poor woman she was now, but with a kind, compassionate heart. "Sure, I'm sorry for you, poor fellow!" she said, brushing the moisture from her eyes with the back of her hand; "but I have scarcely bread to put into my own mouth, a sorrow a bit to give away. Had they allowed her but a shilling or two for outdoor relief, I'd have let that dear little girl share my crust and my bed; but what's little for one is starvation for two. I don't see how I can help you now, unless, there's an old broom in the corner there, if it's any use to you you're welcome to it: may be it will bring you a few pence."

The present was accepted with thanks, and the homeless boy, as he left her little cellar, blessed the voice of kindness which had been like a cordial to his desolute heart. The night was now closing in; whither should the orphan go? He crept under the shadow of an archway, which sheltered him from the rain which was beginning to fall; and from that strange place of refuge rose the humble, trusting prayer of a troubled spirit-but a brave spirit, that was preparing to battle with poverty, to look want in the face, and, by God's blessing, thrust it back, and struggle on to independence. Willie would not beg, but he would earn his bread, though his sole means of doing so was the half-worn-out broom which had been given by one almost as poor as himself.

The sun was scarely up earlier than Willie. He gazed on the brightening sky, dappled with rosy clouds, and breathed forth his morning pray-With his broom in his hand, and a hope in his heart that the Almighty would bless his labours, he passed along the quiet streets, and at last began to work at a crossing by the side of a square, which, from its almost impassable state, seemed to have been neglected for many a day. The labour was new to him, and soon tired his arms; but with resolution he brushed on till a clean causeway was made across the narrow road. Pleased at his own success, he had just paused to rest, when a boy about his own size, also ragged and bare-footed, ran up with a broom in his hand, and in an angry voice accused Willie of having deprived him of his crossing, and tried to take the bread out of his mouth.

"I did not know that it belonged to any one," said Willie, casting a glance of disappointment at the crossing at which he had been working so

" It's been mine this month and more, and it was my mother's afore me," replied Sam Higgins, in no very courteous tone. "Well," said Willie, shouldering his broom with a sigh, "I must go somewhere else, I suppose. Does any one make a long crossing yonder, so as to cut off the corner of the square ?" "Oh, you're welcome to that if it takes your fancy," laughed Sam; "as if any one would wade over that sea of brown mud !"

"They shall not have to wade," replied Willie, setting himself at once to his new task with that resolute spirit which, whether possessed by a king or a street-sweeper, usually secures success. As he plied at his crossing, Willie thought of the

"If I were a cobbler 1'd make it my pride.
The best of all cobblers to be;
If I were a tinker, no tinker beside Should mend an old kettle like me!" And he determined that whatever he did should be done well. Sam, leaning on his broom, watched Willie with a mocking sneer. He was himself quite a stranger to that energy which rises to meet difficulties—that perseverance which resolutely overcomes them. He thought it enough to stand by his crossing, sweep for a moment when he saw a passenger approaching, run after him with loud importunate entreaties to beg the pence which he was too lazy to earn. Willie never begged,—he left his work to speak for him; and as the conduct of the sweepers was different, so likewise, as might be expected, was their success. The long clean crossing was constantly preferred; the boy who remained steady at his post raised the kindly feelings of the passer-by, and became known to the residents round. For every penny which Sam extorted by begging, his silent companion received three. Willie found that he could maintain himself in honest independence. This was comes them. He thought it enough to stand by received three. Willie found that he could maintain himself in honest independence. This was his first upward step.

Willie heard that a Ragged School was openevery evening, not far from the poor lodging which he now managed to procure for himself. Anxious for knowledge,—anxious, above all, to be instructed in the things of God,—he never failed in his daily attendance, and was the most diligent, the most persevering of all the scholars.

"Little good larning will do to such as you,"

eried Sam, sneeringly, as he saw Willie, one day, with a multiplication table in his hand, trying as hard to master its difficulties as he had done to

Willie only replied with a smile; he felt that a useful knowledge which he was acquiring was aother step in an upward path,—that he should use day find the benefit of it; and he thought fend hope of the time when he might impart darling little sister some of the information selv given to himself.

He learned also at the school the value of clean-gained an appearance so respectable and clean that it could scarcely have been believed that both had started from the same point of poverty; but then the one was pursuing an upward, the other a downward path. The object which Willie ever set before him self was to be the support of his sister Ellie. He almost denied himself necessary food to save up his little earnings for her; and earnestly he prayed to his heavenly Father to fulfil this desire o. his heart. As Willie became known in the neighbourhood he was often sent on little errands, employed to fetch water, or to sweep before doors; and many a meal, and many a penny,—yes, and silver pieces the he was enabled to earn in this manner. But still, in the dry, clear autumn days, when his crossing scarcely needed a touch of the broom, Willie felt that his time was not fully employed, -he might do more, -he might gain more

Here, again, the Ragged School offered its valnable instruction. Willie was taught how to make little baskets; and thought his profits were very small indeed, the little rurse which he had made for himself, and which contained all his savings for Ellie, gradually grew heavier and heavier, and every now and then he exchanged a handful of coppers for a bright silver shilling or

Willie was a truly religious boy-his hope and trust were placed in his Saviour; but he well knew that religion gives no encouragement to idleness,-that we are recommended to be not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. The more earnestly he prayed, the harder he worked; his piety gave new impulse to his

Sam, in the meantime, was sinking lower and lower in idleness, poverty, and dirt. His crossing afforded an emblem of his own mind, all neglected and uncared for as were both. But a new era was now to open before him; he was to be given an opportunity of rising at last from his miserable and degraded state. Willie was surprised one day to see his companion appear in the square respectably dressed, his face looking ten shades fairer from a recent washing, and his whole manner expressing pleasure and hope.

"Ah! I've done with you forever!" exclaimed Sam, flinging away his broom, " and done with this wretched, starving life! Plod on there, Will the sweeper, -scrape up your farthings; I've something better before me, I warrant you. My uncle's come to London, on his way to the Indies, and he say it's a shame, and so it is, that a boy like me should work at a crossing, like a slave so he's given me a suit of clothes, d'ye see, and something to rattle in the pockets, and he's got me a situation in the city. I'm agoing now to rise in the world; maybe I'll be a rich man some

"I wish you joy," said Willie, good-naturedly, " what a blessing to have such an uncle!"

Yes, it is a great blessing,—a blessing from God, to be given relations or friends, able and willing to help us on in the struggles of life; but a far higher blessing it is to be granted that industry and perseverance which enables us rather to assist others with their burdens than add to them the weight of our own.

Sam was placed in a situation, and a good one; but to get it was one thing, to keep it another. Sam's master was a tolerably patient man, but there are bounds to the patience of most people. What is to be done with a servant who is always in bed when the fires should be lighted in the morning; who loiters when sent on a message, idles when there is work to be finished; who is never willing, never busy, never clean? What is to be done? Why, after proper trial has been given, there is but one thing to be done, and Sam's master did it; he turned off the boy who was too lazy to work, and Sam found himself again in the streets!
