(From the Christian World.) MARGARET TORRINGTON

OR, THE VOYAGE OF LIFE. By the Author of "Violet Vaughan," "Sir Julian's Wife," "St. Beetha's," &c.

ANOTHER PROPOSAL.

" Would not Mr. Saunderson permit you to go a single voyage ?"

"It is Mr. Saunderson's will that I should be constantly with him. He expects my attendance everywhere, and at all times. It was with diffi culty I eluded him to-day. Ah, Margaret, I am very proud, I fear ; but this dependence is hateful to me. Sometimes I envy the common sailors, and the veriest scarecrows of pilots. If it were not for my parents ! Ah, Margaret, I have just thought of it : you shall go to them ; my mother will take you to her arms at once, and with Alice and Bertha you will be an honored guest. You shall go to them till I can claim you.

"We will think more about it ; and, Gilbert, what shall 1 say to Mrs. Crofton and Tom ?" " Simply answer Tom's suit in the negative .--Leave all the rest of the saying to me. I shall speak to Mr. Saunderson as soon as we are alone to-night; and here we are at Mendig House."

" May we venture to go in together ?"

" Certainly ; we have nothing to hide. I am proud of my afternoon's work, Margaret. Let them think what they like ; they will soon know

But, in spite of Gilbert's cheery words and the pressure of his strong arm, I trembled in every limb as we entered the porch, and beheld Tom glowering upon us from the background of the lighted hall. Certainly I had reached the crisis of my fate! Nevertheless, though I shook with apprehension, I was wonderfully happy-happier than I had ever been in all my life before !

SENT TO COVENTRY.

Not heeding Tom's ungracious demeanour, I went straight to my own room, and shut myself in with my new-born happiness, feeling as if I must contemplate it all alone before I ventured to own to its possession in the presence of any second person. Alas! I had no mother to go to, no father to consult ; the ears that would have listened so tenderly, and with such deep interest to the tale I had to tell, had long since been closed in the silence of the grave. Brothers and sisters I had none, and friends were so few that I could count them on the fingers of one hand, and those few were far away.

But for the moment 1 forgot that in kindred ties I was poorer than most girls. - I forgot the apprehensions and misgivings that had througed upon me, as I walked home in the gathering darkness-appreheusions that Iswas certain Gilbert shared. I thought not of to-morrow and the storm of censure and upbraiding it might bring with it. I could only think of my deep, full happiness in being the beloved of Gilbert Tredgold, of the words he had spoken, of the bright antici-pations that were one day to be fulfilled, of the joy of looking to him as my protector and my nearest friend, of the perfect trust I could repose in him, and of the full content that made me smile as if in serene pity of my old self when I remembered the miserable perplexities of a few hours ago. There was no temptation now to yield the contested point ; Gilbert did not care for Sybil, and he did care for me-his own lips had told me so; and Tom Crofton, with the wealth of a millionaire and the prospect of a coronet, would have sunk into utter nothingness compared with Gilbert, even if he went back to his lowly estate of fisherman. -I suppose it was very silly and romantic of me; but, then, girls in their nineteenth year will be romantic, though the hard world and the stern realities of life cure them quickly enough of what people urgently call " their folly." Ah ! let the folly have its way for a little while ; let the sweet dreams linger ; let the roung heart, heat impulsively as it gazes on the dazzling fairy-land in the beauteous distance. It is but for a while, and changes are at hand to chase away the golden dreams, and to still the impatient heart, and to turn the gleaming bowers of Paradise into the sober earnest land of real life. 2119 And, foolishly and remantically, I dare say, I sat with my hands folded, smithing to myself at the picture of a quiet cottage home somewhere by the sea; a home in its humble yet elegant appointmets, something like the Palace of Content. could see its white walls, mantled, of course, with ivy and flowering creeping plants, especially with "red, red roses," such as used to glow to the intensest and most burning crimson in the level rays of the July setting sun, about the oldfashioned casements of Kelver House. I could see its blooming garden, with trim borders, wellkept turf, and a retired plot for vegetables and herbs, and plenty of fruit-trees everywhere. I. could see its pleasant parlour, simply farnished indeed, but not lacking any of our favourite books, or a rosewood pianoforte. I could even see its cozy kitchen, where one little maid did as she was bid always, and sang merry little ditties about sailor-boys and " the blue, blue sea" as she went about her work. And I could see myself, the most managing, the thriftiest, and the happiest young matron in the world, and the master coming in, when his day's toil was over, tired perhaps, but brimming over with a quiet content as he neared the ivy-clad and rose-wreathed cottage, where he knew he would be waited upon, and talked to, and read to, and sung to, and generally petted, according to his moods. Yes, I could see all this; but between me and the lovely fairyland lay a troubled sea which I must cross as best I might. Would the dream ever become true ?-Would that happy home, thus pictured in my fancy, ever become a reality ? Would God thus bring me "unto the haven where I could be ?" I was roused by hearing some one on the stair-case proclaim that tea was waiting. Before I went down I looked out to see if the stars were shining. Yes! there they were in the calm and silent sky, glittering in the blue expanse, - rich jewels on night's broidered garments. One planet shone screnely, hanging low, as it seemed, above the rising ground I had so lately traversed; and the young moon shed her pale soft light upon the lonely shore, and cast a long line of rippling sil-ver on the sea, where the golden network had glowed and glanced two hours before. I suppose it was the sight of those bright waters, and the low murmur of the tide which reached my ears, that made me think of some words I had learned long ago, sitting on the footstool at my mother's feet. Oh ! mother, mother ! the time came, -- was feet. Oh i mother, mother i the time came, —was even then coming, —when I thanked you in my heart of hearts for all the chapters and verses of the holy word, and for all the sweet hymns yon caused me to commit to memory in my childish days. When I learnt them they were nothing to me; but, once laid up in the safe storehouse of my mind, they were ready for use, when, in after-years, I sorely wanted them, —a hoard of inex-pressible worth —a treasure aver new and ever le worth,-a treasure ever new, and ever loved him beyond all others on the earth, I felt a stranger sad yearning after that better life, that higher and holier love, which sanctifies while it intensifies all fragile human loves. I longed for the peace, for the rest which only they know who have found and are settled on the one Foundation, the steadfast, the immutable, the eternal Rock of Ages, To be Continued.)

Their success has been entirely beyond precedent, and proves how greatly such an instrument was needed. Again and egain the manufacturers have been compelled to dou-ble their manufacturing facilities, until they have increased six-fold.
