What Happened.

It was on a tranquil Summer evening, just like many that had preceded it, that the Widow Anderson sat at her wheel, spinning flax, just as she had sat on many a Summer, Autume, Winter and Spring evening. All was still; flowers and insects seemed dropping asleep; little birds peeped drowsily in their nests, and the whole world seemed as quiet and steady-going as the old clock in the corner—when something bappened I TIM har A But this is not the good, old-fashioned, regular way of telling a story. I will start again 191

In a little post-town, among the Highlands of Scotland, far away from any great city, there lived, a few years ago, a woman much respected and well beloved, though of lowly birth and humble fortunes—one Mrs. Jean Anderson. She had been left a widow with one son, the youngest and last of several pro-mising children. She was poor, and her industry and economy were faxed to the utmost to keep herself and her son, who was a fine, clever lad, and to give him the education he ardently desired. At the early age of sixteen, Malcolm Anderson resolved to seek his fortune in the wide world, and became a sailor. He made several voyages to India and China, and always, like the good boy he was, brought bome some useful present to his modier, to whom he gave also a large portion of his earnings.

But he never liked a seafaring life, though he grew strong and stalwart in it; and when about nineteen, he obtained a humble position in a large mercentile house in Calcutta, where, being shrewd, enterprising and honest. like most of his countrymen, he gradually rose to a place of trust and importance, and finally to a partnership. As his fortunes improved, his mother's circumstances were made easier. He remitted money enough to secure to her the old cottage home repaired and enlarged, with a garden and lawn; and placed at her command, annually, a sum sufficient to meet all her wants, and to pay the wages of a faithful servant, or rather companion; for the brisk, independent old lady stoutly refused to be served by any one.

Entangled in business cares, Mr. Anderson never found time and freedom for the long voyage, and a visit home; till at last, failing health, and the necessity of educating his children, compelled him to ab-ruptly wind up his affairs, and return to Scotland. He was then a man somewhat over forty, but looking far older than his years, showing all the usual ill effects of the trying climate of India. His complexion was a sallow brown; be was gray and somewhat bald, with here and there a dush of white in his dark anburn beard; he was thin and a little bent, but his youthful smile remained full of quiet drollery, and his eye had not lest all its gleeful sparkle, by poring over ledgers and counting rupees.

He had married a country woman, the daughter of a Scotch surgeon, and had two children, a son and a daughter. He did not write to his good mother that he was coming home, as he wished to surprise her and test her memory of her sailor boy. The voyage

One summer afternoon, Mr. Malcolm Anderson arrived with his family at his native town. Putting up at the little iun, he proceeded to dress himself in a suit of sailor-clothes, and then walked out alone. By a by path he well knew, and then through a shady lane, dear to his young, bazel-nutting days, all strangely unchanged he approached his moth r's cottage. He stopped for a few moments on the lawn outside, to curb down the heart that was bounding to meet that mother, and to clear his eyes of a sudden mist of happy tears. Through the open window he caught a glimpse of her sitting alone at her spinning wheel, as in the old time. But, ales, how changed! Bowed was the dear form, once so erect, and silvered the locks once so brown, and dimmed the eyes once so full of tender brightness, like dewstained violets. But the voice, with which she was crooning softly to herself, was still sweet, and there was on her cheek the same lovely peach-blossom of twenty years ago.

At length he knocked, and the dear remembered voice called to him in the simple, old-fashioned way "Coom ben !" (come in). The widow rose at sight of a stranger, and courteously offered him a chair. Thanking her in an assumed voice, somewhat gruff, he sank down, as though wearied, saying that he was a wayfarer, stranger to the country, and asking the way to the next town. The twilight favored him in his little ruse; he saw that she did not recogniz him, even as one she had ever seen. But after giving him the information he desired, she asked him i he was a Scotchman by birth, "Yes, madam," h. replied; "but I have been away in foreign part. many years. I doubt if my own mother would know me now, though she was very fond of me before went to sea."

"Ah mon! it's little ye ken aboot mithers, gi ye think sae. I can tell ye there is na mortal me mory like theirs," the widow somewhat warmly re plied; then added-" And where has ye been for sa lang a time, that ye has lost, a the Scotch frae you

In India—in Calcutta, madam." he "Ah, then, it's likely ye ken something o' my so. Mr. Malcolm Anderson."

"Anderson?" repeated the visitor, as though striv ing to remember. "There be many of that name in Colcutta; but is your son a rich merchant, and man about my age and size, with something such figure head ?"

"My son is a rich merchant," replied the widow proudly, "but he is younger than you by many ng year, and, begging your pardon, sir, far bonni He is tall and straight, wi' hands and feet like a las-sie's; he had brown, curling hair, sae thick and glossy! and cheeks like the rose, and a brow like the maw, and big blue cen, wi' a glint in them like the light of the evening star !-- Na, na, ye are no like my Malcolm, though ye are a guid enough body, ! na doubt, and a decent woman's son."

Here the masquerading merchant, cons sken down, made a movement as though to feav ut the hospitable dame stayed him, saying, "Gir ve hae travelled a' the way fra India, ye maun be d and hungry. Bide a bit, and eat and drink wi us. Margery I come down and let us set on the

The two women soon provided quite a tempting rest, and they all three sat down to it-Mrs. Ander on reverently asking a blessing. But the merchan could not eat. He was only hungry for his mother' kisses—only thirsty for her joyful recognition; ye he could not bring himself to say to her—"I am you n." He asked himself, half grieved, half amusedhere are the unerring, natural instincts I have

The same sank back in her chair with a sigh, saying it answer to his questioning look.—

"Ye minded me o' my Malcolm, then—just in that way he used to stir his parritch—gleing it a whirl and a firt. Ah I gin ye were my Malcolm, my poor laddie!"

"Weel, then, gin I were your Malcolm," said the merchant, speaking for the first time in the Scottish dialect and in his own voice; "or gin your braw young Malcolm were as brown, and bald, and gray, and bent, and old as I am, could you welcome him to your arms, and love him as in the dear auld lang syne? Could you, mither?? to had proved the widow's eyes had been glistening, and her breath coming fast; but as that word "mither." she sprang up with a glad cry, and tottering to her som, fell almost fainting on his breast. He kissed her again and again—kissed her brow, and her lips, and her hands, while the big tears slid down his bronzed cheeks; while she clung about his neck and called him by all the dear old pet names, and tried to see in him all the dear old young looks. By and by they came back—or the ghosts of them came back. The form in her embrace grew comelier; love and joy gave to it a second youth, stately and gracious; the first she then and there buried deep in her heart a sweet, beautiful, peculiar memory. It was a moment of solemn renunciation, in which she gave up the fond maternal illusion she had cherished so long.

"Well, mother dear, now you must rest," rejoined the marchant temperature.

me."
I have only to say, that both the good woman's hopes were realized. A very happy family knelt down in prayer that night, and many hights after, in the widow's cottage, whose climbing roses and wood-bine were but outward signs and types of the sweet-ness and blessedness of the love and peace within.— Dittle Pilgrim.
