A Strange Witness.

At the inquest on the bodies of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, the evidence of Lieutenant Gretorex, of the 12th Royal Dragoons, was of such an extraordinary sort as thoroughly to justify the remarks passed at the time on his conduct. He admitted he saw the struggle from about three hundred yards off and thought it merely horseplay. He was walking on the same side of the road as the assassins and their victims, but had to turn round to call one of his dogs which was "very delicate and nervous and always running away." When he looked again there was one of the men apart from the others, striking another man and pushing him down.
He thought it was rather a brutal thing to knock two men down in that way.
He looked round to see if there was anybody about that they might co-operate in catching the fellows. He saw a laboring man behind him and observed that it looked like a bad business—a self-evident proposition in which the other coincided.
They then went up to the bodies, when the laboring man said, "This looks like murder"; the Dragoon replying "Yes," and adding suggestively, "We had better give information to the police?" The laboring man thought so too, but didn't do it any more than the Dragoon. The former walked away, and the latter, seeing an Engineer, tackled him in like manner, and the two walked towards the park gate, where they met two constables, who said it was no business of theirs.
Instead of taking their numbers, this blundering dragoon thought it quite natural, and did not blame them, because two brother officers of his have since told him that his "story looked like a hoax!" A little further on they met a mounted policeman, and told their tale to him, passing on towards the barracks instead of guiding him to the spot. He had no idea who the victims were; never went to see; never left anyone with the dying men.

One (Mr. Burke) seemed to be dead, but the other (Lord Frederick Cavendish) was all over dirt, and I did not think he was dead. When I saw him lying on the road covered with dirt and dust I thought he was one of the men who had attacked this gentleman, and that the gentleman had shot him. Everyone I told the story to paid no attention to it.

A Juror—Having regard to the condition in which the gentlemen were, did it not strike you that you might have been of some assistance to them in stanching a wound and perhaps saving a life?

Witness—I was so startled that I candily confess I did not know what to do.

Juror—You simply passed on?

Witness—I went to get assistance as soon as I could, and to give information.

The Coroner—As regards this gentleman, who some may think ought to have stopped, it is right to say that presence of mind is not given to everybody. Some men will act promptly and energetically where others will not. I do not think there is any great blame to be attached, seeing the extraordinary nature of the thing. The gentleman could not get anyone to believe him, and he could not know what to believe himself.

A Juror—Do I understand you to say that you thought the person in the road was one of the persons who attacked and murdered Mr. Burke?

Witness—He was so dirty that as he lay there I thought he was one of the men who attacked the gentleman.

Another Juror—The only thing the witness could do, as he could not do anything himself at the moment, was to go where help could be got.

Witness—I was so horrified. I assure you that I did the best I could.

A Juror—When the laboring man came up to you at the angle of the road did it never occur to you that with the assistance of the engineer you should try to follow in the direction of the car?

Witness—They went so quickly there was nothing of the car to be seen when we came to the bodies.

A Juror—Are you able to say it was a hack car?

Witness—Yes; I looked for the number, but could not see it.

The Attorney General—The car was out of sight when you saw the bodies?—
Yes.
