

STARVED TO DEATH.

A Refined Canadian Girl Estranged From Home by Love Affair.

MEETS A SAD DEATH IN NEW YORK.

(Special to the Daily Herald.)

New York, July 31.—With two men claiming her love and offering assistance, with wealthy parents in Canada from whom she kept her plighted, Elizabeth McCormick, a refined, pretty girl of Montreal, starved to death in this city, dying yesterday afternoon in the German hospital. At first it was thought to be a case of suicide by poison, but while poison was a contributing cause, starvation carried the girl away.

From letters found among the effects of the dead girl from a brother, Daniel, in Montreal, and from John McDonald of Cardigan, P. E. I., it appears that she could have had anything she wished from them. Instead of calling for aid when she could find no employment in New York, she sold her clothing piece by piece, and when all was gone she let death claim her.

The girl comes of a very religious family in Montreal. Her father is said to be an officer in the Canadian customs service. It is believed that the trouble that ended in her death had its inception in her love for a Montreal man, who, on account of his agnostic principles, was obnoxious to her family.

Eventually the conditions in her home became unbearable and she came to this city, stopping on the way to visit a sister, Margaret, who is a nun in a Boston convent. She secured a position in a hair-dressing shop in 6th av, and took a room with a family named Denner at 235 East 58th st.

At the beginning of the dull season the girl lost her place. She was unable to secure employment, but bore her troubles uncomplainingly as her little money dribbled away.

On the 4th of July, while walking through 58th st., she attracted the attention of Joseph Ronan, a young clerk, living at 210, but a few doors from her dwelling. He spoke to her and by degrees learned at least part of her story.

Ronan helped her to the extent of his small means, and wanted to marry her. She told him she was bound to marry a man in Montreal. About two weeks ago she disappeared from 58th st and went to board with Mrs Daunt. She remained there a week, but could not eat. Starvation had weakened her system, and arsenic tablets, which she was in the habit of taking to alleviate her pain, had helped along. She was sent to the German hospital a week ago yesterday, and there young Ronan found her. She was unable to eat the fruit he sent her, but she enjoyed the flowers he carried to the hospital daily, and his was the last name she uttered before she died.
