THE CANADIAN LYNX.

A Striking Picture of Uncompromising Ferocity—Not Specially Aggressive to Men—Stories of the Imagination.

Scarcely another animal presents such a striking picture of savage hatred, of uncompromising ferocity, as a Canadian lynx at bay. That brutal head, with its low forehead, beneath which two cruel eyes are blazing like evil stars; that fierce display of teeth between the parted wrinkled lips, and the massive, powerful feet, hiding flesh-tearing hooks of living steel, all impress the beholder with the fact that a personal encounter with a Canadian wildcat must end in death for at least one of the combatants.

Not that the lynx is specially aggressive in his attitude toward men—far from it—and the stories of how he follows belated hunters through the overhanging branches of the forest trees, seeking a favorable opportunity to spring upon his human prey, are products of the imagination. But when, after a chase, he is driven to take refuge in a tree, where he crouches in preparation for his last battle, I would prefer, unless armed with a rifle, to interview almost any other creature of equal weight.

Many years ago, the Canadian lynx was to be found in the mountainous districts of New England, New York and Pennsylvania, but now he is seldom seen far south of the Canadian border, writes Ernest Harold Baynes. He is to be met with in Labrador, and he is quite common in certain parts of the Dominion, where he is hunted chiefly for his skin.

He is somewhat larger than the common American wildcat (lynx rufus), and, moreover, his head is rounded and broader in proportion than that of his kinsman. His triangular, furry ears are each tipped with a tuft of coarse black hair. The general color of the body is grey, with many irregular darker spots; the fur on the under side of the body is lighter. Beginning at the ears, and extending downward around the throat, is a ruff of longer hair, which adds not a little to the animal's appearance of ferocity. The tail is short, thick and well covered with hair.

He is splendidly adapted for the wild life which he leads. Glad in his thick winter fur, he can resist the most penetrating cold, and when his hunting luck is against him, as it often is, his great vitality enables him to exist for many days without food. His methods of pursuing and capturing his prey are very similar to those adopted by the domestic cat. That is to say, he usually either lies in wait until his victims unconsciously come within jumping distance, or stalks them cautiously until he is near enough to venture a swift rush upon them. His great strength of limb and his formidable teeth and claws generally prevent any successful opposition on the part of his intended prey. He is a great enemy of birds particularly in the breeding season, when he will often spring upon grouse, wild geese and others, as they sit upon their eggs, or as they travel about hampered by their helpless little ones. He also preys upon rabbits, hares, woodchucks, squirrels, young fawns and even lambs and young pigs, if they stray to a reasonable distance from the barnyard. It is doubtful if he ever voluntarily attacks man, but while wounded and at bay he has, first and last, put a good many hunters out of commission.

The Canadian lynx is a splendid climber, and although he usually travels for some distance when pursued, he generally takes a tree when hard pressed. Here he is safe from practically all his enemies but man. Sometimes a wildcat will endeavor to escape by leaping from a tree to the ground, and it is remarkable from what a height the creature can leap without injuring himself. Moreover, he is not the least bit disconcerted by the drop, but, alighting on all fours, he is prepared at once to do battle with his enemies. He is also a good swimmer, and more than once canoeists have been surprised by having him come aboard in mid-stream; his idea no doubt being simply to rest from his exertions. He is not an easy problem for a dog to solve, as he is one mass of bone and muscle, and when engaged in fighting seems to bristle with teeth and claws. Nevertheless, a dog with plenty of weight, courage and experience will generally come out first best, albeit he may look as though he had been put through a cotton gin.

Confirmed.

In April, 1858, the Prince was confirmed, in the presence of his parents and sisters. Among the other spectators were the three statesmen, Lord Derby, Lord John Russell, and Viscount Palmerston. The Archbishop of Canterbury performed the ceremony, and had examined the Prince on the previous day "for a full hour" says Prince Consort, "and Bertie acquitted himself extremely well."
