FIGHT WITH ROBBERS.

Station Peppered in the Conflict.

THE MASKED VISITORS PUT TO FLIGHT.

Morristown, N. J., Jan. 5.—The single ray of light that shot out into the darkness from a chink over the door of the little ticket office of the Lackawanna Railroad station here was the only sign of life in the vicinity at 3 o'clock this morning. Inside the office, some 15 by 20 feet in size, and dimly lighted by a single electric bulb, there was lying on a desk right under the light a prostrate figure. It was that of a man with his arms folded under his head and his legs drawn up to a sharp angle in order to keep them on the desk. He was undramatically snoring.

The man was P. A. Tower, the night operator. He was sleeping the sleep of the just and had a right to it, for no train was due for a couple of hours, and there was no business to attend to.

Suddenly he heard a harsh noise, awoke and yelling out an "A!" "Come in!" turned over on his side, preparing to doze off again.

Then there came a blow against the panel of the door. Tower sat bolt upright on the desk, and his hand went out to the drawer beneath it, where he kept his loaded revolver. Before he had reached the weapon the panel yielded and dropped noisily to the floor. Through the opening, Tower made out the glint of lines of a gun barrel, and back of this a pair of eyes staring at him from behind a mask.

"Throw up your hands," a hoarse and muffled voice commanded. Almost simultaneously the barrel spat fire and Tower heard the whistle of a bullet within an inch of his ear. Pretending that he had been bit, the operator fell heavily backwards and lay still. But his left hand sought and found the drawer with the revolver. A second more and the weapon was in his hand. Just as he turned to raise it, the barrel belched flames and smoke again. A bunch of time tables lying at the end of the desk almost between the feet of Tower disappeared as if wiped off by some unseen hand.

The next shot was Tower's. It was fired while he was still in a lying position, but it missed the hole in the door by an inch. The barrel was quickly drawn back and the eyes melted away in the darkness. Quick as lightning the operator rolled sideways down to the floor between the desk and the window. It was done neatly and in the nick of time. "Crack-crack-crack!" snapped a revolver outside the door. The first bullet hit a calendar above the head of the man behind the desk. The second grazed the desk itself. The third one smashed the light bulb into a thousand fragments. Everything was lost in the darkness.

Tower had a good idea where the door and the broken panel were. Peeping round the corner of the desk, he pressed the trigger three times as quickly as he could move his finger. He heard two bullets strike against something hard. In the wake of the last shot came a sound as of somebody drawing in the breath very hard. Then Tower heard shuffling steps outside. They gradually died away.

Turning around without rising up, he lifted the window shade an inch. It enabled him to make out two shadows that glided rapidly past the window and disappeared up the track in the direction of Morris Plains.

Tower jumped to his feet and pulled out a match. A minute later his telegraph apparatus was ticking out Morseese. Within an hour railroad detectives were on the trail of the visitors of the morning.

The safe in the ticket office contained $2,000 at the time, and there was $30 more in one of the desk drawers.

Singing of Telegraph Wires.

Dr. A. S. Thompson, Alvinston, writes: A short time ago I noticed a reference to the singing of telegraph wires, and surmises as to its cause. About nine years ago I made a series of observations in Toronto on the subject and noted the following facts: First, the sound was independent of wind; second, the humming of wires running east and west invariably presaged a fall of temperature, often ten or more hours in advance of the thermometer; third, the humming of wires running north and south advised a rise in temperature, almost always several hours in advance of the thermometer; fourth, wires running north and south and wires running east and west never hummed together, not even when the same wires running along an east and west street turned down a north and south side; only that portion of them hummed that indicated a rise or fall in temperature, as explained above. If one part hummed the other part was silent. The deduction I came to was that the humming was due to electric currents in the air.—Toronto Globe.

THE planters from whom I buy my tobacco in Cuba are the most expert tobacco growers in the world. They keep the plant nipped back carefully—free from suckers and only leaves enough on the plant for it to properly mature and nourish.

In this way the good of the tobacco—the proper qualities to make it excellent smoking, are evenly distributed all through the plant. Thus the leaf I secure for my Pharaoh filler is perfect—an even smoker—palatable and delicately odorous.
