ALL FOR GOLD.

Pauline mourned her lover and her secretely affianced husband with true sorrow. His death had shaken her nature to its very foundations, and had left her prostrate and a shadow of her former bright self. But together with her grief there was borne upon her another feeling—a determination to discover his murderer, to bring to justice the hand that had not only robbed her young life ofall sunshine but had deprived her country of one who would have added to its honor and lustre.

This feeling was hardly one of revenge—at least, it did not assume that aspect to her own mind—but rather a desire to do what she felt was her duty to the dead man who had committed his heart and devotion to her keeping. It was something she owed his memory, something she would do her utmost to repay.

The grief of Pauline was very quiet in its intensity. She made no outward hysterical show. She lived her life very much the same as she had done previously during those long period when her lover was so far away waging his silent war against the difficulties and secrets of a jealous Nature. But it had left its traces plainly marked on her fair young countenance, and anyone seeing her talking quietly in the drawing room at Mount Street to her dearest friend and school-fellow, Dora Colvin, the daughter of Colonel Colvin, whose property adjoined that of Viscount Oxendale's, would hardly have recognized the girl who, but a week or two previously, had been regarded as one of the brightest of the season's beauties.

"No," Pauline was saying, "I won't come out with you today, Dora. I hardly feel up to it. Besides, I'm expecting Gerald Mildmay to call; but of course you know that," with a faint smile, for the engagement of Gerald and Dora was already public property.

"Yes, dear, I remember. And when he comes I'll retire, for you will have business matters to discuss."

"They will be nothing you may not hear, my dear, and as Wallace has made Gerald his executor you will know as much about the matter as he does."

"No no, Pauline; Gerald is very reliable in that way. He doesn't ever chatter about business, and it was only at your request that he told me Vipan had left you all he had."

"Call him Wallace, please Dora. He was Vipan to the world—to me he was Wallace."

"Certainly, darling, if you wish it. You will like having his things, I am sure."

"I shall love having them round me; they will seem to be a part of himself now he has been takenfrom me," and the poor girl's voice faltered. But with a strong effort she conquered herself and continued, "I thought of asking Mr. Mildmay to—"

"Call him Gerald, Pauline."

"Very well. I think I may; he's a very old friend. I thought of asking Gerald to take me to Wallace's chambers this afternoon before anything is touched. If he can, will you go with me?"

"Of course, dear. If I can help you in any way you've only to ask me."

"Ihave spoken to father about it, and I am going to have the furniture taken out of my room and replaced by Wallace's things. Some people might think it a morbid idea, but I don't feel it so. So many of his possessions are the records of his exploring trips, and though I did not accompany him, yet I shared his journeys with him, in a manner, for we talked them over and arranged all his plans together before he started."

"Of course, of course. There never were two people more bound up in each other's ideas and intentions than you and Wallace, I think."

"You noticed that, did you, Dora? For really it was so. There was sympathy or affinity—I don't know the proper term for it— between us, I am certain. I always, even when he was thousands of miles away, seemed to be cognisant of any danger or difficulty he was encountering. I used to talk to him of this when he returned, and by comparing dates we found I was generally right."

"How curious! I've never noticed that with regard to Gerald and myself, but then he certainly had not done the things that Wallace did."

"And the very last time I saw him I had a presentation of evil and spoke to him about it. It was all vague and uncertain, and I could not tell from what quarter it threatened, but I felt it was there."

"And Pauline, have you experienced anything of the same kind since—since he was taken? I mean as to who did it? For the police seemed utterly at sea. They haven't found a single trace."

"No, nothing definite. But I have the feeling that some day I shall know and be able to lay my hands on Wallace's assassin; and, strangely enough, it is accompanied by no sense of horror or feelings of revenge. It is only as if I should be doing something for my darling."

Just then the door opened and the footman announced Gerald Mildmay.

After mutual greetings—and Gerald was very quiet and gentle towards Pauline—the girl asked him if he could spare the time to accompany her to the dead man's chambers.

"Most certainly, Miss Spencer. I should be very glad if you would come, for I should like your directions regarding one or two things."

"Are they really mine already, Mr. Mildmay? I mean, are all the legal matters settled?"

"Yes, Miss Spencer, I have obtained probate this morning, so you are now in actual possession to do as you like. The various shares and securities will be transferred to your name, and I should like to know to what bank you would wish me to pay the cash poor Vipan left."

"To my account at the London and Westminister, if you will be so kind, Mr. Mildmay. And I don't know how to thank you sufficiently for all you have done for me. I am more grateful than I can tell you."

"Miss Spencer, I can't say it was a pleasure, because of the loss we have sustained, but I felt I would do it rather than anyone else. Vipan and I were such very old friends, and it would have seemed sacrilege if anyone else had gone through his papers and things."

Later in the afternoon the three friends found themselves in the rooms lately occupied by the dead explorer. It was one of the hardest trials that Pauline had been called upon to endure, but she faced it bravely, and though the various little things lying about brought her great loss more vividly to her mind than ever, beyond a slight hesitation on first entering she did not give way. For a time she was busy with Mildmay, giving directions as to the removal of the furniture to Mount street, and then said,—

"Now, Mr. Mildmay, I want to see Wallace's papers."

"They're in his drawers, Miss Spencer. There are the keys. I have had to go through them, of course, but they were in an awful state of muddle, for that—that—someone had ransacked everything, and—"

"Yes, I know, Mr. Mildmay, but did you come across a letter in Italian, signed 'Piero Balbi'?"

"I don't remember seeing it."

"It would have a portion of the dried leaf of a tree with it."

"Then I'm sure I didn't. All the papers I came across I put most carefully together."

"Then don't trouble about it. But would you mind making them up into a bundle for me, and I will take them back with me to Mount street. I wish to go through them myself. I feel certain some of them have been stolen."

"Certainly, Miss Spencer," and as Gerald moved the mass of papers and documents from the drawers Pauline stood close beside him, watching. As he lifted the last bundle something fell and rattled on the bottom of the drawer. The girl bent forward and picked it up. It was one half, together with the opened link, of a shirt-cuff fastening. She glanced at it a moment and then, without saying a word, wrapped it in a scrap of paper she found on the floor and placed it in her pocket.

The examination of the bedroom in which Vipan had met his death proved even more trying to Pauline than the inspection of the sitting-room, but she faced it bravely, and after giving certain directions as to the furniture she said to Gerald,—

"I will have all Wallace's clothes sent to Mount street. And—and—have the police taken that suit of pyjamas he was wearing?"

"No, I had them put away, just as they were."

"Send them with the other things.'

"But, Miss Spencer, would they not be—?"

"Send them with the other things, please," replied Pauline, quietly and firmly. She was standing beside the fireplace as she spoke, and her eyes happened to fall on a little carved bowl formed from some kind of small gourd, and ornamented by a pattern rudely burnt on the outside. In it were a lot of odds and ends—pins,bits of tie-fastenings, the half of an old railway ticket, the voucher for a stall at the Haymarket Theatre, and a portion of a sleeve-link and other odds and ends which collect in a bachelor's bedroom. Without making any remark, Pauline wrapped up the ornament with its contents and put it in her pocket. Then, returning to the sitting-room, she said,—

"Now, Dora and Gerald—for I am going to call you Gerald for the future—I want you both to choose anything you like as a momento of the one we have lost. I wish you to have something, because I know ho would have liked it, he was so fond of you both. So do not hesitate."

"Yes, he chased a rat out of the barn and then laid himself down in the sun and slept all the afternoon."

English as sometimes spoken:

"Are you going to take that little trip with me I spoke about last week?"

"I haven't thought about it."

"Well, think of it this week, will you?"

"Yes, if I think about it I'll think about it."

"By the way, I saw you on the street the other day and you never noticed me."

"I never noticed you."

A southern congressman tells a story of an old negro in Alabama, who in his bargaining, is always afraid that he may get "the worst of it." On one occasion, it appears, this aged darky went after a calf that he had pastured all summer, and asked what he owed for the pasturing.

"I have a bill of $10 against you," said the farmer who had undertaken the care of the animal, "but if you are willing I'll take the calf and call it settled."

"No, sah!" promptly exclaimed the negro. "I'll do nothing like dat. But," he added, after a pause, "I'll tell you what I will do—you keep the calf two weeks longer and you can have it."

"Look here, Halton, why in creation did you lure me into buying a ticket for that lawn fete?"

"Why, did you pay out too much?

"Much? Why they charged me 50 cents for lemonade and a dollar for ice cream."

"That was exorbitant."

"Then I was lured through the 'Maze of Mystery,' 'Witches' Cauldron,' etc., and by the time they finished telling my fortune I didn't have a penny."

"That was tough."

"Oh, I could have recovered from that, but it was the sequel. When I reached home dead broke my wife accused me of playing poker and has not spoken to me since."
