The Horser's Inferno.

"Paris is the inferno of horses" is a very old aphorism. French cabmen and carters have in general very little love for the horse. Many consider this wretched quadruped as a simple tool, a motor with four feet, rather than as a precious servant worthy of regard and consideration. Not a day passes in the capital without one witnessing revolting brutality, often coupled with real stupidity.

He Understood.

"Do you understand," asked the Sabbath school teacher, "what is meant when we say that time shall be no more?"

"Yes'm," answered Tommy. "It means when the clock stops."

St. Alban and His Teacher.

By some strange irony St. Alban, the martyred but possibly mythical Roman soldier, whose festival falls on June 22, has quite overshadowed his probably historic instructor, St. Amphibalus, whose anniversary comes on the following day. About Amphibalus we know that he was a native of Caerleon, which the golden legend expresses by dubbing him "a prince's son of Wales in erote araye." He was buried at Redbourne, but "translated" to St. Alban's abbey, where his cup was preserved, "which they of the common sort call St. Affabelle Bolle." In former times children were frequently christened with his name, and Affabelle Partridge was goldsmith to Queen Elizabeth—Westminster Gazette.

Dunkirk's Fete de Lanterns.

One of the quaintest of the numerous yearly fetes still in honor at Dunkirk is the fete of lanterns, instituted many hundreds of years ago in honor of St. Martin, bishop of Tours, who died in 396, and who was one of the prelates by whose efforts the early inhabitants of these parts were converted to Christianity. As soon as dusk sets in the celebration commences, and all the urchins of the town congregate in the main thoroughfares. Each one bears a paper lantern, some of which are of considerable proportions, being shaped in the form of a ship or a flower. With lanterns in hand and blowing lustily on horns and trumpets, the crowd of youngsters parades the streets.—London News.

Faith Cures Elephants.

The temple elephant in southern India is the object of great respect, for physical contact with him is supposed to do more good to the human body than the best medicine. Adult men and women warily feel his legs with their finger tips and press them reverently to their eyes, and ailing children are for a small consideration carried on his back the distance of a few strides that they may be cured.—Madras Mail.

He Understood.

"Walk right in, dear. Your supper's ready, your slippers are right where you can find them easily, and your pipe and tobacco are on the writing desk, handy for you."

"All right, Molly," groaned the tired, suspicious husband. "You can get that new dress tomorrow."

Make or Break

Meantime she was seeing the world. It went by her in the beginning like a panorama; it almost made her dizzy. Yet, although at last she was a part of it and as eager in the rush as any, she was never quite at home in it.

Captain Harding had indeed had some measure of the luck he had hoped for, and he was floating the shares of the Nimble Dollar mine in a way that made his wife hold her breath when he reported his successes to her. He had been on the ground, he had seen the mine, he knew what he was talking about, he was not anxious for too large a price, and he came out of the transaction with a small fortune.

"Now," he said, "if I did what my folks and your folks would approve of I should lay this down to grass—that means interest—and go home and build a house with bow windows and a French roof and be the rich man of the region."

"Yes," said Grace.

"But you believe in me, don't you?" asked he anxiously.

"Yes," said Grace.

"You'd like to see me one of the millionaires? I've as good a right to big money as the best of 'em, and I'm going in for it. I'm going into Wall street in earnest!" And Captain Harding had a sense of assured success which made him the happiest, best natured and busiest man alive. "Tain't luck," he said to his wife. "It's a long head. I'd look pretty hidin' such a knack of business in the corner store, wouldn't I? And as for you, I'm proud of you every day!"

But Mrs. Harding was not proud of herself. She would not let her husband know it, but she felt herself wholly unequal to meet the women of society with whom her husband's affairs brought her into some association, invited now and then to their houses, to their opera boxes—women who had acquaintance with each other, with foreign life, who knew what to do and how to do it and who without the least ill feeling often overlooked and ignored her and made her feel herself out of it. She sent home boxes of gowns and other things to Louisa and her mother (of which in their private talks they said they would have preferred her own things to make over for themselves, without dreaming how unsuitable they would be), and she sent grandma a gray silk wrapper in whose ruffles and lace she would look like a little old flower, as Grace pleased herself by thinking, and she sent her grandfather a fur coat and a wonderful meerschaum pipe. She had a feeling that such things were, as her husband phrased it, so much to the good. Now and then she sent her father a little money, but she did not have much money. Captain Harding needed all his ready money, but she had generous credit—and bills. "Pile it on!" said her husband. "One must look successful in order to be successful, you know!"

They still lived at the hotel, where they had what seemed to her royal rooms, although she never grew used to them, and, although entertaining there those who accepted their invitations, she always had a sensation that one day those people would find her out for a fraud.

She laughed sometimes when she saw herself in the glass, with her bare shoulders and jewels, her satin and lace and marabou, with a kind of mockery. But she never let her husband know that this was not what her soul longed for, that she was afraid of the other women or that she felt all their own new way of life to be of very uncertain tenure.

She did not have so much chance as once to let him know her state of mind. He was occupied from morning till night; he was writing and telegraphing and seeing people and down in the lobby talking with men till midnight, the hotel lobby being a minor Wall street.

Things seemed to her to be in such a whirl that sometimes she wondered if she were not dreaming. She wrote home, but she said very little of herself and her life. She described impersonal things, like pictures and shops.

"Louisa," said her mother once, "it's borne in on me some ways that Grace ain't happy. She's got the desire of her heart, she's out in the world seein' things, but she ain't happy."

"That's because she hasn't any baby," said Louisa, dancing her boy on her knee and then letting him pull her curls all about her face. "I'm sure I don't know what we done before this little person came."

"I'd like to see your baby," Grace had written her sister. "Some time—just for a look—I may drop in upon you when you least expect it."

"I wish I could drop in on her," said her mother.

"You wouldn't know her," said Louisa. "I wouldn't wonder but you'd think it was the queen or the president's wife or suthin'."
