CAMP SUSSEX.

Great Crowd of People to Witness Dominion Day Review of the Troops--Premier Tweedie Presented Colors to 73rd Regiment.

The review of the troops in camp at Sussex Monday afternoon, attracted a large crowd of visitors.

The reviewing officer was General Lake of the headquarters staff, Ottawa, and a feature of the afternoon's proceedings was the formal presentation of new colors to the 73rd regiment, Premier Tweedie performing that pleasant ceremony.

The camp grounds, the common objective point of the crowd. By noon the population of a village had gathered between the divisional and staff lines to watch the salute of 21 guns in honor of the country's birthday.

The two breech-loading batteries were posted on the eminence looking toward the railroad. Minute and hour hands had scarce come together on the dot of 12 before there was a jet of flame, a roar of smoke and the first of the twenty-one reports was echoing throughout the hills.

Two hours later practically the entire parade ground was swarming with life. White frocked figures under radiant sunshades flecked the brozy stretches of green.

A half hour later the red and blue battalions were forming into position for the review was timed to begin at 3 o'clock.

THE REVIEW.

At sharp 2.30 General Lake and staff cantered down from headquarters and took up position at the saluting point. He reined in close where a Union Jack, the short staff driven into the sod, was whipping in the breeze.

Directly back, at an interval of perhaps thirty paces, stood the public, off to the left, and forming one side of the cavalry. Facing the saluting point stretched the 73rd regiment in line of column, and to the right was drawn up the remainder of the infantry brigade.

PRESENTING THE COLORS.

The function of presenting the colors commenced when Sergeants Grey and Watling walked to the drum that had been placed on the turf just in advance of general and staff. They laid the colors on the drum, after which the uncasing was performed by Major Irving, second in command. Capt. McNaughton and the two senior lieutenants, McKenzie and Belyea. Rev. Canon Montgomery, camp chaplain, then formally consecrated the colors, the function beginning with the singing of Brightly Gleams Our Banner.

Following this, the banners were handed to Premier L. J. Tweedie, who then presented them to Lieuts. McKenzie and Belyea, the two officers kneeling as the presentation was made.

The premier's address, while brief, could have scarcely been more fitting. But out of the 4,000 or 5,000 present not more than a few hundred could have heard what he said. His voice was clear and enunciation distinct but the gale created difficulty in hearing. You could only now and then catch a few words. "Scattered provinces," "defence," "unity," "pleasure"—to the majority it was practically impossible to follow the address by trying to connect the breeze-borne fragments.

THE PREMIER'S REMARKS.

He began by alluding to the pleasure he would experience in being requested to present colors to a British regiment, but under the present circumstances he felt particular gratification for it had been his good fortune to be an officer in the 73rd regiment for thirty years.

He made reference to the great advance the dominion had made since confederation, and felt that as Canada's anniversary came around her people would have more and more pride in being entitled to call themselves Canadians.

Persons might differ respecting the question of the defense of the empire, but with war once declared and the maintenance of the empire threatened there would never be any friction or division.

The late war in South Africa had done more, he said, to cement together the peoples of the empire and develop the idea of imperial unity than any other event in the preceding century. He trusted that the colors just presented would never be unfurled in time of conflict but if war did come and an attempt was made to capture the colors the officers and men of the 73rd regiment he felt confident would suffer annihilation before the colors could be taken.

The forces then presented arms, the national anthem was played and officers and non-coms, the colors carried in advance, rejoined the regiment, the anthem being slowly played as they returned to the line.

Off to the left was drawn up in column the 8th Hussars and at the opening bars of The British Grenadiers by the regimental bands in front of the saluting point the squadrons advanced at a walk. The horses (and no better mounts have ever been seen in camp) seemed to realize the importance of the moment. With flanks gleaming, and clamping at bit and stepping out bravely, a mere walk didn't seem to suit them. A gallop, charge would have been more acceptable. While helmeted, sitting erect yet easily and with leather bandoliers slung over the shoulder, the lines of horsemen looked fresh and fit.

Next came the artillery, the gunners perched on the pieces and looking serious and workmanlike. The guns, though but twelve pounders, are yet ponderous pieces of machinery, but each was pulled with seemingly little difficulty. Like the cavalry horses those of the artillery were capable and handsome.

Then swung into view the trudging infantry. First were the men of the 67th regiment from Carleton county, presenting a broad scarlet front, for they marched in line of column.

After them was the 71st from York for Charlottetown, then the 73rd of Northumberland and North Shore, and finally the 74th of Kings and Albert.

General Lake will be in camp for two days, after which he will proceed to Charlottetown and Halifax.

FLAG WAS NOT LOWERED

And Earl of Meath Notes the Fact.

London, June 30.—In the House of Lords the Earl of Meath asked whether the flag on the palace at Westminster had been lowered on the death of Premier Seddon, and whether the government did not consider that the time had arrived in the history of the empire when such a tribute should be paid the memory of the death of a Premier of a self-governing colony.

The Earl of Liverpool replied that the flag was only lowered on the death of the King or a member of the Royal family.

The government did not see its way clear to take the course suggested by the question.
