THE DRIFT O[F ...]

"That I do not admit. I only remember that I assisted you to obtain your revenge on a man who had wronged you. In summing up so judiciously, pray do not forget that point."

Nikola evidently thought that he had obtained an advantage, and was quick to improve on it.

"Come, come," he said, "what is the use of our quarrelling like a pair of children? All that I want of you is an answer to two simple questions."

"What are your questions?"

"I want to know what you did with Bartrand's body when you got it out of the cab?"

"You really wish to know that?"

He nodded.

"Then come with me," I said, "and I will show you."

I led him into the house, and, having reached the bed in the corner, pulled down the sheet.

He bent over the figure lying there so still and then started back with a cry of surprise. For a moment I could see that he was non-plused as perhaps, he had never been in his life before, but by the time that one could have counted twenty, this singular being was himself again.

"I congratulate you," he said, turning to me and holding out his hand. "The king has come into his own again. You are now one of the richest men in the world, and I can ask my second question."

"Be certain first," I said. "I inherit nothing from Mr. Bartrand."

"What do you mean by that. I happen to know that his will was made in your favor."

"You are quite mistaken. He made a later will this afternoon, leaving all his money and estates to four London hospitals."

Nikola's face went paler than I had ever seen it yet. His thin lips trembled perceptibly. The man was visibly anxious.

"You will excuse me for appearing to doubt you. I hope," he said, "but may I see that will."

I called Mr. Maybourne into the room and asked him if he had any objection to allowing Dr. Nikola to see the paper in question. He handed it to him without hesitation, keeping close to his elbow while he perused it. The doctor read it slowly from beginning to end, examined the signature, noted the names of the executors, and also of the witnesses, and when he had done so, returned it to Mr. Maybourne with a bow.

"Thank you," he said, politely. "It is excellently drawn up, and, with your evidence against me, I fear that it would be foolish for me to dispute it. In that case, I don't think that I need trouble your hospitality any longer."

Then, turning to me, he led me from the house, across to where his horse was standing.

"Good bye, Pennethrone," he said, "All that I can say is that your luck is greater than your cleverness. I am not so base but that I can admire a man who can surrender three million without a sigh. I must confess that I am vulger enough to find that it costs me a pang to lost even my sixty thousand. I wanted it badly. Had my coup only come off, and the dead man in there not been such an inveterate ass, I should have had the whole amount of his fortune in my hands by this time, and in six months I would have worked out a scheme that would have paralyzed all Europe. As it is, I must look elsewhere for the amount. When you wish to be proud of yourself, think that you have balked Dr. Nikola in one of his best planned schemes, and saved probably half a million lives by doing so. Believe me, there are far cleverer men than you have tried to outwit me and failed. I suppose that you will marry Miss Maybourne now. Well, I wish you luck with her. If I am a judge of character, she will make you an able wife. In ten years time you will be a common place, rich man, with scarcely any idea outside your own domestic circle, while I—well, the devil himself only knows where or what I shall be then. I wonder which will be the happier? Now I must be off. Though you may not think it, I always liked you, and if you had been thrown a lot with me I might have made something of you. Good bye."

He held out his hand, and as he did so, he looked me full in the face. For the last time I felt the influence of those extraordinary eyes. I took the hand he offered me and bade him good bye with almost a feeling of regret, mad as it may seem to say so, at the thought that in all probability I should never see him again. Next moment he was on his horse's back and out on the veldt making for the westward. I stood and watched him until he was lost in the gathering gloom, and then went slowly back to the house, thinking of the change that had come into my life, thanking God for my freedom.

* * * * * * * *

Three months have passed since the events just narrated took place, and I am back in Cape Town again, finishing the writing of this story of the most adventurous period of my life, in Mr. Maybourne's study. Tomorrow my wife (for I have been married a week today) and I leave South Africa on a trip round the world. What a honeymoon it will be!

"The Pride of the South," you will be glad to hear, has made gallant strides against the late trouble in Rhodesia, and, as my shares have quadrupled in value, to say nothing of the other ventures in which I am associated with my father-in-law, I am making rapid progres towards becoming a rich man. And now it only remains for me to bring my story to a close. By way of an epilogue let me say that no better, sweeter, or more loyal wife could a man possess than the one I possess. I love her with my whole heart and soul, as she loves me, and I can only hope that every masculine reader who has the patience to wade through these, to me, interminable pages, may

The work is done in one small living room and the woman has supported her whole family since January, when her father lost his work.

Some of the worst examples of sweating women workers are found in the tailoring trade. For making men's and boys' trousers one woman is paid 2d. and 1½d. per pair respectively. Out of this she has to pay 2¾d. per reel for cotton and also buy paste for stiffening canvas.

BLOOD MONEY.

In another case a widow with three children, who works thirteen hours daily in a single living room, earns from 1s to 1s 4d a day by making boys' knickers and trousers and men's white cotton coats. For the knickers she is paid from ½d to ¾d. each, and for the coats 2d each.

Paper tea bags are paid for in one case at the ridiculously low rate of 1s to 1s 10d. per thousand not including the pastel which costs 2d. It takes seven hours to make 1,000 small-size paper bags, and nine hours to make 1,000 large ones. lb

It is a curious fact that dolls' bodies are made in factories, but the heads, arms and legs are always given out. One woman is paid 1s a gross for making such arms and legs and 6d a dozen for heads.

A. O. H. RESTORED IN GOOD STANDING.

Government Now Permits Them to Work in the Province of Quebec.

Quebec, June 30.—Mr. J. Gallagher C. E., provincial secretary of the Ancient Order of Hibernians and Mr. J. J. O'Flaherty, president of the Quebec branch waited upon Premier Gouin this morning in regard to the recent Order-in-Council passed, prohibiting that order from doing any further business in Quebec, on account of not complying with the law to report annually the membership and financial standing of the order, like all mutual insurance organizations,

The delegation assured the Pcemier that the A, O. H. was not a mutual benefit association, inasmuch as it had no insurance, that it was a national and benevolent society, and furthermore that the order, as far as the Quebec branch was concerned, never received any notification list, above a blank that it should report to the government.

The delegates were referred to the provincial secretary, who, after explaioations stopped the proclamation from appearing in the Official Gazette and re-established the order in the good graces of the government, with the understanding that the order would report its standing annually in future.

RELIEF SUPPLIES SAID TO BE STOLEN.

Superintendent of Relief Station at San Francisco Arrested.

San Francisco, June 30.—Accused of selling large quantities of blankets and appropriating the money, John Clark, superintendent of Red Cross Relief Station at Golden Gate Park, and George Bryant, engineer at the children's playground in the park, who, it is alleged, aided and abetted Clark, were arrested by detectives recently.

The police say that they learned of the alleged speculation through A. Suggerman, a junk dealer, to whom Bryant offered to sell a quantity of new government blankets. Bryant said he would deliver him 400 and if the price offered was satisfactory, it would lead to a delivery of 800 pairs a week. Suggerman told the police, who set a trap for the man.

The police secured 400 blankets as evidence.

"I say it looks [like] rain."

"What does?"

"The weather."

"The weather, my dear sir, is a condition. Rain is water in the act of falling from the clouds. It is impossible that they should look alike."

"What I meant was that the sky looked like rain."

"Equally impossible. The sky is blue vault above us—the seeming arch or dome, that we mistakenly call the heavens. It does not resemble the falling water in the least."

"Well, then, if you are so might[y] particular, it looks as if it woul[d] rain."

"As if what would rain?"

"The weather of course."

"The weather, as before stated, being a condition, cannot rain."

"The clouds then, confound you."

During Lord Kitchener's recent visit to the Indian frontier defences he inspected a new fort. He was astonished to find that it had been so placed as to be commanded by a nearby hill. The officer who had chosen the site was present with the party and Kitchener called him forward. Instead of the outburst that the staff expected. Kitchener merely held out his hand and said:

"I congratulate you, Colonel ——. What a capital place for a fort. When do you begin to remove the hill?
