FOR LOVE OR HONOR.

Spars everywhere were shattered, and great rifts appeared in the flapping canvas. The rail and bulwarks were broken and smashed on every side. There was not a single boat left swinging at the davits. Splintered woodwork showed where numberless shots had taken effect, and charred pieces of timber on every hand added heart-breaking evidence of conflagration's devastating touch. From the depths beneath the deck came low groans and murmurs of pain, accentuated by the sharp shriek of some deeper sufferer or the delirious raving of some fevered patient. Elizabeth shrank back appalled.

"How horrible!" she murmured. "Take me away. I cannot stand it!" He caught her in his arms. A little more and she would have fainted.

"Good heavens!" he said. "In all my battles I never saw such a ship! What a frightful scene! They didn't get off without a fight," he added slowly. An officer, with head bound up in a handkerchief and his arm in a sling, was approaching them.

"Sir," said O'Neill, saluting the while, "I am the officer who escaped last night. I deliver myself up—why, it's Stacey!" he cried in great surprise, recognizing a brother officer of the Richard. "What do you here, man?"

"'Fore gad, it's O'Neill!" cried the other. "Glad are we to see you, man. But this lady—this is no place for her."

"She goes with me," said O'Neill, briefly. "But you?"

"This is where I belong."

"Ah, they have captured you, I suppose."

"No, the ship is ours."

"And the old Richard?" cried O'Neill fervently. "And Captain Jones?

"Aft there on quarter deck."

"Come, Elizabeth!" he cried, seizing her by the arm, and, he assisting her, they made their way with difficulty in the confusion to the quarter heck.

"Ah, O'Neill, thank God I see you alive again!" said Jones, springing forward, his face beaming. "We got there in time, then, I see."

"Yes, sir, thanks to this lady," answered O'Neill, pointing to Elizabeth.

"Madam, you are fit for a sailor's bride," said the little captain.

"'Tis high praise, sir, from Captain Jones, I protest," she answered, rallying herself in the relief of assured safety.

"Would God that I had been with you in this battle!" cried O'Neill gloomily.

"We missed you. I wished often for you," answered the captain. "The poor old Richard was torn to pieces under our feet. We could not stay on her longer, so we had to come here."

"And I not there! I suppose that I have forfeited everything forever for going up to the castle. Shall you break me, sir?"

"Nothing, nothing shall be done, my poor boy," answered the captain kindly. "You have been punished enough by not having been with us in the greatest battle ever fought on the sea. But it seems to me you have not entirely lost the game. You too, have a prize in tow. How go your love affairs," he whispered.

"Well, indeed, sir. The Lady Elizabeth is here, as you see. We are to be married at once, sir."

"You may have the chaplain of the Serapis for that purpose."

"Yes, sir. When he last officiated for me he was reading my burial service," replied O'Neill, smiling.

"Some people would say it is much the same thing," laughed the captain; "but we know better. Ah, well, that's over now, thank God, and this lady—Madam," he said, turning to her, "I bade you welcome to a ship once before. It is a different ship now, but the welcome is just the same."

"Know you ought of Major Edward Coventry, Captain Jones?" cried Elizabeth. This time it was she who remembered.

"Why, he lies on the deck yonder, dying. He wouldn't let me take him below. Do you know—but I forgot; he was your friend."

"Take me to him," she cried hastily, and in a moment she was kneeling by his side. They had made him as comfortable as possible with cushions and boat cloaks, but his hours were numbered. His head was thrown back, his face ghastly pale. Blood stained the linen shirt about his breast. His eyes were closed. The end was at hand.

"Poor fellow!" said O'Neill in great sorrow. "He died for me." And then he briefly recounted the circumstances of their escape to the astonished captain.

"Do you know how he was wounded, sir?" he asked.

"It was my own hand that struck the blow," answered Jones. "Would it had been otherwise! There was a moment in the action when they sprang to board. He leaped upon the rail, cutlass in hand. He was a fair and easy mark. I met them with a pike, which I buried in his bosom. He fell back smiling. I remember that I thought it strange to see him smiling at that time, even in the heat of the battle. Too bad—too bad!" he said.

"Oh, Edward," cried the girl, tears streamikg dowk her face, "I never thought to see you thus! I never meant to bring you to this! If you could but speak to me—to say that you forgave me for it all! If I could have your blessing before"— The man stirred a little and opened his eyes. He looked about him vacantly, but consciousness began to dawn again, and with the dawn came the recognition. It was the face of Elizabeth bending over him. She was the woman whom he loved. There, back of her, was O'Neill. He began to comprehend.

"Elizabeth," he murmured, "my death—not in vain—then."

"Forgive me—forgive me!" she cried brokenly. "Oh, forgive me! I did love you!"

"Yes," he said, faintly smiling, "but—not like"—

He glanced at O'Neill. "You, too," he murmured. "Make her happy." His mind wandered a little. "Father," he cried suddenly, "don't look at me in that way! I did it because I loved her; her happiness before mine."

"Oh, doctor, can nothing be done? Is there no hope?" cried O'Neill to the attending surgeon.

"Nothing, sir. 'Twill not be long now," answered the surgeon, shaking his head.

MIDDLE HAINESVILLE.

Jan. 24.—The recent rain and fog has completely taken the snow from our fields and all there is on the road is ice.

Business is at a standstill for cold weather and snow, and seldom do we have occasion to wish for cold weather and snow this time of year in New Brunswick.

Rev. J. J. Barnes held service in the Union Baptist church here on Sunday morning. He has again changed his appointments to first and third Sundays in the morning.

Rev. M. R. Knight held service in the church here on Sunday afternoon.

Mr. C. C. Wiggins has closed his blacksmith shop and gone to the woods for awhile. He will be much missed as a blacksmith is always in demand especially these icy times.

Edwin Wiggins has about finished his winter's lumbering and is now beginning to think of getting his mill in operation for the spring's cut which promises to be a large one.

Mrs. J. McLeod, of Caverhill, spent a few days at the mill.

Miss D. Perkin is spending a few days with Mrs. C. Wiggins.

S. K. Nason and N. Chute, of Burtt's Corner, spent Sunday in this place.

Avery Elliott, of New Hampshire, is visiting friends and relatives in this place.

Miss Alma Jones spent Sunday at home.

Harry S. Caverhill and Miss Eliza Caverhill, of Southampton, spent Sunday with friends in this place.

The family of Mr. Leslie Staples, who have all been confined to the house with la grippe, are getting out again.

Mrs. I. Brewer, of Keswick, spent a few days with her niece, Mrs. Sterly Brewer.

Our school has again reopened with Miss Fowler of Carleton Co. in charge. Owing to the severe colds the attendance is quite small.

BOIESTOWN.

Jan. 23.—The weather for the past few days has been very warm and springlike.

John Hovey of Ludlow, is building a store house on the Taxis river to store provisions for next winter for the Mirimichi Lumber Company, who expect to make a big cut next winter.

The parties on the Taxis are getting through hauling.

James McLellan and Company are now distributing telephone poles from Parker's Ridge to Taxis River for the Miramichi Lumber Company. They are going to run a telephone line from John Robinson's camp, on the Taxis River, which will make it very convenient for the lumbermen.

James W. Cameron has finished his operations in the woods on the Bartholomew river.

Mrs. M. Pond and Mrs. F. McElwee were calling on friends this afternoon.

Rev. Mr. Kent is teaching Latin to some of the advanced scholars of this place.

NURSES' SUPERSTITIONS.

I'll never have an old-fashioned nurse again, said the young matron with a several months' old baby.

Mother insisted in my engaging one of the old-fashioned kind when my little son was born, and although we found her delightfully free from pedantic theories she was almost bound hand and foot by superstitions.

When the baby was dressed for his first trip outdoors I found her climbing the attic stairs with him. On my demanding an explanation she said that if a child was to have luck through its life it should always go up before it went down, so she was going into the attic with it before she took it down stairs.

Then when I held my baby up to the mirror she shrieked and pulled me away, and said that if a baby saw himself in a mirror before he was a year old he'd die before he was two years old.

When the baby fell out of bed and bumped his poor little head she didn't give him a bit of sympathy, but said she was glad, for if a baby didn't fall out of bed before he was a year old he'd be a fool.

She worried me to death poking behind his left ear to see if a little brown spot there was going to be a mole, for she said a mole behind the left ear meant the child would be hanged some day.

The little fellow said "mamma" one day, and she said it was a pity so long as I hoped if I ever had another child it would be another boy, for whichever the first child said first, mamma or papa, showed what the sex of the second child would be.

She weaved such a net of superstitions around that child I actually grew nervous for fear he would never be a success as a baby or a man, and I was very glad when she left me.

STATE CAPITOL SHAKY; PART OF IT CLOSED UP.

Albany, Jan. 29—The trustees of State Public Buildings this afternoon instructed J. Robert Hill, superintendent of public buildings, to close all approaches to the Assembly staircase in the state capitol, including the entrance to the Assembly chamber and elevators leading thereto.

This action was brought on the recommendation of the state architect, George L. Heins, on the basis of a report made to him by William Barclay Parsons and Daniel E. Moran, expert engineers of New York City, after an examination of the Assembly staircase, which has been under suspicion for several months.

The engineers have informed the state architect that the integrity of the capitol building as a whole should be investigated in this connection, including tests of the foundations.

With reference to the crumbling condition of the Assembly staircase, the engineers advise that the conditions which caused the cracks observed for several years are still in force and that a state of great internal stress exists in that part of the structure, and that the public should be excluded from the use of the staircase because of the danger of falling pieces of stone or of a collapse of the staircase.

It is believed by those familiar with the conditions that the situation is exceedingly serious and at the best, part of the building will be out of use for two or three years.

LOWER HAINESVILLE.

Jan. 25.—Fair weather today after the rainy season. Teams are going fine over the icy road.

Samuel Chute died this morning at the home of his brother, Arthur, where he has been kindly and carefully taken care of. He has been an invalid since childhood and leaves behind him three brothers, Wellington and Handley in the States, and four sisters, Mrs. Isaiah Brewer and Mrs. Morehouse, of Keswick, Mrs. William Hill of Millville and Sarah Ann, of the United States.

Lee and Frank Billing piled their horses and loads in a heap on their ay to Burnside. The men escaped unhurt, the horses were injured quite badly but are better.

Our school is going on pleasantly under the care of Miss Manzer of Millville.

Some of the boys are home from the woods and are enjoying the skating.
