ing the paint shop) was on fire. "I saw him run out," said Mr. Stevens, "and a little later I followed. I didn't see him in the crowd and as the night wore along and he didn't appear I began to fear for his safety."

Mr. Stevens and his son were up for the most part of the night and after breakfast they visited the ruins. They were passing along over the ripped and smouldering floor of the paint shop when Mr. Stevens saw something lying in the ashes not far from where had been one of the paint shop doors. It was a battered silver watch. He examined again and saw a charred skull and about a peck of bones, a handful of coins all run together and a bunch of keys. He had discovered all that there was left of Mr. Jones.
