HAIL TO THE CHIEF.

The city of Toronto declared the people there were ready to fight the new legislation and yet when they were given a chance none came forward; there were three acclamations in the face of this. I repudiate that word 'coercion' as applied to what we have done." (Loud applause.)

Sir Wilfrid contrasted the stand taken by the Conservatives in 1896 which he opposed and declared: "I can appeal to all the provinces and I am confident they will say I was on exactly the same platform in 1905 as in 1906." He continued: "I am not here to argue about schools; I will only say we should carry on the work of confederation as it was conceived, remembering it was a work of compromise to unite discordant elements into a great confederation. We are a nation today because there was an appeal then to all the nationalities to make a sacrifice of their prejudices. But why dwell on this, it is a dead issue at the present time. I only took up this question for the sake of those who may have misunderstood me and whose good opinion and support I value highly. Let us pass on to another more congenial subject."

"In the past ten years, Canada has made gigantic leaps forward from the obscure condition of a single colony into the rank of a proud nation. (Loud applause.) Today her trade, judged imports and exports in proportion to population, is third among the nations of the world."

Providence was on the side of the Liberals, not the Tories, and the country's prosperity was due to wise progressive, prudent and bold administration.

"For six years before the Liberals came into power the school question had furnished a cleavage that impeded growth. Since 1896 there had been a general peace that the mischief makers of last winter had not altered. Another impediment to growth in those days had been the instability of the fiscal policy. It was always being tinkered with, scratched at, demolished and restored and the restoration again demolished until the manufacturers prayed to heaven for the demolition of the tariff tinkers." (Laughter.)

Sir Wilfrid gave a list of the changes in the tariff made each year since 1879 which went as high as 180 in 1886. "Now, under our regime the manufacturer can sleep soundly upon his two ears." (Laughter.) "The changes made have been chiefly to introduce new principles."

"The anti dumping clause of 1904, the denouncing by England of the Belgian and German treaties and the preferential tariff were all beneficial to Canada. The latter had introduced a new era in the history of the empire. Since then Canada's trade had gone up by leaps and bounds. As for a mutual preference that must be left entirely to the people of Britain to decide. A uniform tariff for the British Empire would be impossible for the empire can be maintained only on the one condition, that every component part be left to do the best it can for itself."

"Canada was the friend of whatever party was in power in Great Britain and could never allow herself to be an apple of discord. But the great question for Canada was transportation."

Sir Wilfrid combatted the idea that too much had been spent on railroads and proceeded to give a glowing picture of the trade that lay open for Canada through her great trunk lines across the continent with 400,000,000 people of China and Japan. Canada was in a position to profit more by this market than any other people in the world. He hoped that not many years would pass when there would be witnessed train upon train loaded with passengers and wheat and flour whirling away toward the west, and as many more bearing eastward passengers and silk and tea to be distributed to all parts of the world."

The close of the premier's address was a glowing peroration calling the people of Canada to the great career that lay before them to the height of their opportunity.

"Let us see that in this country of Canada there shall be work for all hands and the best remuneration for all work." (Applause.) This is the thought that I have to give you at this moment, to give you now as the guiding star in the struggle for the advancement and prosperity of your country."

"I have been through many a struggle, and like many other public men, I have had my troubles. I have had my moments of discouragements. Everything is forgotten in my presence here, when I am the recipient of so much kindness at the hand of my fellow countrymen of the Province of Ontario." (Applause.)

"I have had many receptions tendered me in the course of my public life, but I have not seen anything that equalled or approaches this banquet tonight in order, in beauty, in numbers. It excels everything that I have witnessed. It excels anything that has taken place in this country. As the recipient of it, however, I need not tell you that it is a red letter day, and that to the end of my life I shall carry with me as the most precious of all the treasures which I can carry to the grave with me, the mark of sympathy and confidence which has been given to me today by the reformers of the great banner province of the Dominion." (Loud applause.)

MOUNT ALLISON WON.

Mount Allison won the New Brunswick intercollegiate championship last night by defeating the University of N.B., 1 to 0, in a rather slow hockey game in the Queen's rink, St. John. Mt. Allison will now play the St. Francis Xavier College, of Antigonish (N. S.), for the maritime intercollegiate championship. The date has not yet been agreed upon, but will likely to be arranged soon.
