Late at the Play.

We know from Pepys and from passages in the plays of contemporary dramatists that the manners of theater audiences in the restoration epoch were not nice, but there is no reason to believe that even the fops habitually arrived at the theater late. Mr. Sparkish, Mr. Novel and their fellows would talk loudly while the play was going on to show the superiority of their wit to the poet's, but they likely were on hand early to lose none of the fun. In later epochs of English theatrical history theater going was a serious undertaking, not a mere pastime. One can tell from the beginnings of old plays that the authors counted on audiences closely attentive from the first. Lady Randolph is the first speaker in "Douglas," Orestes in "The Distressed Mother," Almeida in "The Mourning Bride." The custom of "playing the audience in" with a short piece was of still later origin. Perhaps about that time the habit of going late to the theater became common. "Half price" for late comers was a custom of Thackeray's time.—Westminster Gazette.

PRINCE'S FAREWELL

His Royal Highness Departed for Home Yesterday After a Week's Stay in Canada

QUEBEC, July 28.—All the warships in the harbor again thundered forth a royal salute of twenty-one guns this evening when the Prince of Wales left Canadian soil and boarded the Indomitable, not to touch land again until he reaches England. An interesting announcing made from the citadel this evening is that the Prince of Wales, on the eve of his departure, has presented to the people of Canada a chair which belonged to General Wolfe.

In the afternoon, the Prince's time was very fully occupied. He first attended a gymkhana at the Q. A. A. grounds, where he stayed for some time, and then left for the Plains, where it was children's day, and a gala performance was given, together with a display of daylight fireworks. This was attended by upwards of fifteen thousand children of all ages, from seven to seventy, and the performance proved a huge success.

After giving the younger generation a chance to cheer their future King, the Prince drove to Spencerwood, the beautiful residence of the Lieutenant Governor, Sir Louis Jetté, where a delightful garden party was given in his honor, and at which he spent an hour walking in the grounds, chatting with various friends in a most formal style—in fact the Prince had evidently planned to make his visit as free as possible from fuss and feathers, and he managed it so well that his arrival was almost unnoticed, as also was his departure.

On leaving Spencerwood, His Royal Highness drove in state to the citadel where he bade formal farewell to his hosts. In the meantime, the streets leading from the Citadel to the King's wharf had been lined with soldiers, and every preparation was made to give the heir apparent a fitting salute as he left the soil of Canada. It was speedily known that the Prince was going to leave, and the streets were crowded over the entire route. When the royal cortege appeared, preceded by officials in automobiles, the Prince's carriage, guarded by two detachments of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, it was greeted with cheers, the Prince having to rise and salute during the entire distance. A picturesque feature was afforded, when the royal procession swung into sight from above in the narrow streets of the lower town. As soon as his carriage came in view the immense crowd on the terrace, as though by preconcerted arrangement, broke into a tremendous cheer, and the Prince rose in the carriage, waving his hat in acknowledgment of the compliment.

A moment later the guard of honor from the garrison R. C. R. presented arms at the King's wharf and the national anthem pealed forth, which was immediately taken up by band after band from the warships. As soon as the prince reached the deck of the Indomitable the royal standard was hoisted from the foremast and once again the war-scarred heights of Quebec resounded with the thunderous greetings of three nations to Great Britain's future King.

WARSHIPS FULLY MANNED.

Every warship was fully manned, the rails being lined with bluejackets and marines, waiting motionless as the sharp flashes and noisy smoke marked the salute. As the last echoes died away the band of the Leon Gambetta was heard in the distance playing God Save the King, then the Admiral Aube took up the refrain the American warship New Hampshire followed and then in rhythmic succession the six British battleships, until the national paen died away up the river. A solitary trumpet then rang out from the deck of the Exmouth, and a second later three tremendous cheers were given by the ten thousand sailors and marines with a volume of sound that reverberated from shore to shore and was answered by the crowds that lined the terraces. It was practically the farewell of Canada to the prince as well as that of the fleet and the ceremony was well worthy of the occasion, the stately ceremonial and warlike salute harmonizing perfectly with the natural amphitheatre which is so picturesquely beautiful.

Early tomorrow morning, in fact shortly after daybreak, the British fleet will sail so that today's proceedings were possibly the final farewell to be given by the people of Canada to George Prince of Wales, as in the ordinary course of events it is scarcely likely that he will revisit Canada before he succeeds to the throne—an event, however, which all Canadian citizens will join him in hoping may long be deferred.

What He Did Object To.

The author of "Kings of the Hunting Field" says that at a certain English church many years ago while the clergyman was reading prayers a man walked in, shouted, "I've got 'un!" and immediately withdrew. He had sounded a well known call. Every farmer and laborer who possessed a gun soon followed him and in an hour or two brought to the village inn the fox they had shot. Spirituality was in those days at a very low ebb, and some clergymen cared more for sport than for the example they set to their flocks. Bishops tried to discountenance hunting as a clerical pastime, but the law did not enable them to remove the offenders from their livings. Dr. Phillips, bishop of Exeter, who called to account several sporting clergymen in his diocese, met one of them at a friend's house.

"I am told, my lord, that you object to my hunting," said the clergyman. "Dear me, who could have told you so?" answered the bishop. "What I object to is that you should ever do anything else."
