SYNOPSIS OF CANADIAN NORTH-WEST

HONEST AD REGULATIONS

Any even numbered section of Dominion Lands in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, excepting 8 and 26, not reserved, may be homesteaded by any person who is the sole head of a family, or any male over 18 years of age, to the extent of one-quarter section, more or less.

Application for entry must be made in person by the applicant at a Dominion Lands Agency or Sub-agency for the district in which the land is situated. Entry by proxy may, however, be made at an Agency on certain conditions by the father, mother, or daughter, brother or sister of an intending homesteader.

The homesteader is required to perform the homestead duties under one of the following plans:

(1) At least six months' residence upon and cultivation of the land in each year for three years.

(2) A homesteader may, if he so desires, perform the required residence duties, by living on farming land owned solely by him, not less than eighty (80) acres in extent, in the vicinity of his homestead. Joint ownership in land will not meet this requirement.

(3) If the father or mother, (if the father is deceased,) of a homesteader has permanent residence on farming land owned solely by him, not less than eighty (80) acres in extent, in the vicinity of the homestead, or upon a homestead entered for by him in the vicinity, such homesteader may perform his own residence duties by living with the father (or mother).

(4) The term "vicinity" in the two preceding paragraphs is defined as meaning not more than nine miles in a direct line, exclusive of the width of road allowances crossed in the measurement.

(5) A homesteader intending to perform his residence duties in accordance with the above while living with parents or on farming land owned by himself must notify the Agent for the district of such intention.

Six months' notice in writing must be given to the Commissioner of Dominion Lands, at Ottawa, of intention to apply for patent.

"Well, what do you think of the place?" asked Sir Ralph, somewhat abruptly.

"It's a fine old place; but it looks rather desolate, does it not?" answered Laura.

"I like it, somehow. I think it will suit me."

"But, Sir Ralph," began Laura, nervously, "is it wise to come?"

"Why?" he replied, coldly.

"This cur answer was so perfectly unexpected to Laura that her face flushed and then grew pale, and the two walked on in silence for the next few minutes."

"There is plenty of game, I am told, and it is a good hunting country," presently said Sir Ralph; "and the old house will look better when it is inhabited. You and Mr. Gifford must come and pay me a visit when I am settled."

"Thank you," answered Laura, mechanically. She had meant to ask him not to take this place, not to throw himself in her way; but Sir Ralph so ignored her in the matter that she felt it was impossible to speak on the subject.

"By-the-by," presently said Sir Ralph, "I was just going to tell you all about Patty May's letter when Miss Lindsay came in before luncheon. The girl is off her head! She entreated me—she implored me, with tears in her eyes, she wrote, to tell her how she had offended me. She said she must see me, and all sorts of insane folly."

"And did you write any answer?" "Not a line; I simply put the letter into another envelope, and sent it back to her; and that was the rudest thing I could do, wasn't it? And she deserves everything she has got, and more."

"It was very treacherous." "It was worse—" And then Sir Ralph, muttering something between his teeth that sounded very like an oath, turned away, and for the next few minutes preserved a gloomy silence, which Laura did not attempt to break.

His very walk showed the restless impatience of his mind. He was thinking. "She has spoiled two lives, this girl I was fool enough to believe," and his heart was very bitter toward Miss Patty May.

Presently, however, he roused himself from his moody reverie. He began talking of Danvers Park and Mrs. Vanhurst.

"There is a woman," he said, "with an excellent husband of her own, yet who wishes and tries to make every man she sees in love with her. It is, however, only a happy delusion of her own that any man is."

"You are very severe on the poor little woman," answered Laura, smiling.

"Just severity. Ah, there is Mr. Gifford and Miss Lindsay; I wonder where they have been?"

When they met, George and Anna Lindsay explained. They had been to the fish-pond, and declared it was well worth seeing.

"It's a charming place, altogether," Sir Ralph, said Anna.

"It's a nice old-world place, I think," he answered. "When I am settled I hope you will all come and pay me a visit, Mr. Gifford."

"That would be delightful!" cried Anna Lindsay, instantly adopting the invitation.

"There's capital shooting about, so it would be a great treat to come," said George, highly pleased at the prospect.

"Well, then, I shall hope to see you ere long. What about the necessary repairs, Mr. Gifford?"

The two men then began to talk on business matters, and Laura and Anna Lindsay walked on together among the old-fashioned flower-beds, now choked with weeds. The leaves came floating down from the tall trees to their feet; in the air was the indescribable taint and tint of the fading year. A strange feeling of melancholy crept over Laura's heart, and she scarcely listened to or answered Anna Lindsay's lively remarks.

"He's evidently quite taken a fancy to the place," said Anna. "I wonder what his own place in Yorkshire is like?" And so on.

Sir Ralph had, however, apparently "quite taken a fancy to the place," for when the gentlemen rejoined them they found that the arrangements for the purchase of Harwood were practically complete.

"And I wish you joy of your purchase," Sir Ralph, said George, cordially.

"Thanks," replied Sir Ralph, without cordiality.

After this they started on their return to Suffolk, and when they reached that town Sir Ralph took leave of Laura and Miss Lindsay.

He was going to return that evening to Danvers Park, but before doing so went with George to his office to sign some necessary papers.

"I've done a good day's work," said George, with elation, when he returned home after parting with Sir Ralph.

"You have," thought Anna Lindsay, with malignant pleasure. And just about ten days after this she felt sure that her suspicions regarding Sir Ralph Woodland and her cousin's wife were true. In the meantime George and Sir Ralph had written to each other twice about the repairs at Harwood, and in each case George had shown Sir Ralph's letters to Laura and Anna Lindsay. They were, however, purely business ones and he made no mention in them of any immediate intention of visiting Harwood. But one day, when Anna Lindsay came in from her afternoon walk, and was proceeding to the drawing-room for five o'clock tea, just as she reached the room door she heard a man's voice speaking within whose tone reminded her of Sir Ralph Woodland's.

She stopped and listened, and did not go into the room, but went to the top of the kitchen stairs and called the waiting-maid to her.

"Who is that in the drawing-room?" she asked.

"Sir Ralph Woodland, Miss Lindsay," answered the waiting-maid.

"Is my uncle there?" she inquired.

"No, miss; the old gentleman is out."

Anna Lindsay asked nothing more. She quietly returned to the drawing-room door, and from where she stood could distinctly hear what was said within the room. It was Sir Ralph Woodland who was speaking.

"I can not help it," he was saying; "I can not keep away."

"But it is wise, is it right?" answered Laura, with a tremulous ring in her voice.

"It may not be; but Laura, when I believed evil of you, when that lying girl maligned you so shamefully, and I tried to forget you, I could not. I came back to see you then, and I have come back now."

"I wish you had not bought that place, Sir Ralph; I tried to tell you this the day we went to Harwood."

"I know you did, and I would not listen. I bought it to be near you, but I have no need to tell you this."

"But—but it is no use—I can only see you very rarely."

"But for the sake of these rare visits I mean to live there. Do not reproach me, for I can not help myself."

Anna Lindsay listened no longer. She heard one of the servants coming up the kitchen stairs, and with swift, sure footsteps she hurried away. But she had heard enough.

She knew now that the two in the drawing-room had met before they met at Lady Danvers' as George Gifford supposed; she knew that they had been lovers, she believed they were lovers now.

Her red-brown eyes sparkled, and she sank down on a chair in her own room, trembling and gasping with excitement.

"He has taken that place to be near her," she told herself, "he will persuade her to run away with him, and George—George will come back to me."

CHAPTER XXI.

Half an hour later Anna Lindsay heard Sir Ralph leave the house, and watched his tall figure as he walked across the Market Place. Then she went down to the drawing-room, and found Laura still there.

"Sir Ralph Woodland has just been here," said Laura, quietly enough, as Anna entered.

"Indeed!" replied Anna, trying to speak in her ordinary way.

"He has come down to see about the alterations at Harwood; he is going to stay on a little while now for the shooting, he said."

"He's a great sportsman, isn't he?"

"Yes; George said he is a splendid shot. He has gone down now to George at the office."

"That was all that was said. Anna sat drinking her tea, and wondering that the carpet did not open under Laura's feet and swallow her up for her iniquities. Laura sat silent and absorbed. These two women never had much to say to each other, and they seemed to have less than usual this afternoon. Then, about half-past six o'clock, George entered the room quite in a state of pleasurable excitement.

"So Sir Ralph called to see you this afternoon, Laura?" he said. "He told me he had been here, and I've had him at the office for ever so long, and now he's gone on to Harwood. He's going to build stables there, and make no end of alterations; and he means to stay over the winter for the hunting. But I dare say he told you all about it."

"He told me he was going to stay there for a little while just now," answered Laura.

"Yes; and he's had a lot of fine carved furniture sent down from town, and he's asked us all to go and stay with him; he's really a very civil fellow."

Anna Lindsay did not speak; she sat with her eyes fixed first on the husband and then on the wife. The storm was brewing, she was thinking bitterly, and she longed for the thunder-clap to burst.

"I did not care for Harwood very much," said Laura, slowly. "Do you, George?"

"It's a fine old place, I think; but it's something to have a neighbor who can offer you such shooting as Sir Ralph can. Certainly these rich fellows have it all their own way in the matter."

A CANTON PAGEANT.

London May Thus Honor Accession of Its Printer Lord Mayor.

Something altogether delightful and new is in contemplation for the show which will inaugurate the reign of Sir George Truscott as Lord Mayor of London. Louis N. Parker will be master of the pageant, and he has submitted to the sub-committee which has charge of the arrangements in the preliminary stage his scheme for the coming "show."

Inspired by the circumstance that the Lord Mayor is a printer and a member of the Stationers' Company, Mr. Parker has chosen the figures for his pageant from the golden age of English literature. He proposes to begin his period with Chaucer (1323 or 1340 to 1400), and to end in the middle of the seventeenth century with Milton. This gives him a range of great men of letters, and if his scheme in all its fulness is approved at the meeting of the grand committee, London will witness something very picturesque and daring in the way of spectacles.

Particularly appropriate will be the inclusion of William Caxton, who set up the first printing press in England in the Almonry that stood to the west of the Sanctuary of Westminster Abbey. Caxton, by deputy, working at his ancient printing press of 1470 and a modern master printer, in the person of Sir George Truscott, appearing in the same procession will provide a singularly piquant contrast. Shakespeare and Bacon—although the historic question the appearance of the two figures—will have a place, and Spenser and Raleigh and Ben Jonson and Sir Philip Sidney will be there.

Al though the full details will not be settled until Thursday, this brief outline will give some idea of the scope of Mr. Parker's plans. It is understood that 200 figures, mounted and on foot, will walk in the procession but this number will, of course, include many minor figures and attendants.

WEALTHIEST ACTOR-MANAGER

Sir Charles Wyndham's Art Has Piled Up a Handsome Fortune.

So Sir Charles Wyndham, who has just produced "Bellamy the Magnificent" at the New Theatre, London, is reputed to be. And every penny of his capital he has made by his own exertions without the assistance of "backers." Moreover, when he first started in management, his capital amounted to $150. Early to rise has always been Sir Charles' motto, and, whatever time he may have gone to bed, he is up every morning at eight o'clock and ready to transact business an hour later. Like Sir John Hare, Sir Charles has a very good opinion of Americans and American audiences, and tells some good stories of his experiences while touring on the other side of the Atlantic. On one occasion a manager went to him and pressed for a performance, at which the prominent citizens of the town would be present.

"I consented," says Sir Charles. "There was no time to post bills, so they sent out runners. I went down to see the hall. Not a seat in the place. 'Don't you worry about that, you'll find all the chairs there tonight,' said the manager. And so I did, sure enough. When I arrived in the evening the hall was half full of chairs, of all shapes and sizes—camp stools, piano stools, three-legged stools, drawing-room, dining-room, and kitchen chairs—in fact anything on which one might sit down. I couldn't understand it until I was informed that it was the rule of the theatre that everybody who purchased a seat should provide his own. The place at night was packed—the approaches to the theatre being crowded with contingents of families entering the place, followed by negro servants carrying half-a-dozen chairs on their shoulders."

West Virginia.

West Virginia is twice as large as Massachusetts, twice as large as Maryland and as large as Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware, New Jersey and Vermont combined.

Rubber Tires.

Rubber tires have three natural enemies—light, heat and oil—all three of which should be guarded against.

A Comparison in Weights.

A cubic foot of air weighs a little less than an ounce, while a cubic foot of water weighs 1,000 ounces. A cubic foot of gold weighs 1,926 ounces and a cubic foot of platinum 2,150 ounces.

Beet Sugar.

The effort to make sugar from beets dates back as far as the year 1747.

A Long Mile.

In the German geographical mile there are 8,100 yards. In the American 1,760 yards. Thus the German mile is equivalent to more than four and a half of our miles.
