While they are accumulating knowledge on the profound sciences, are often so ignorant of their own natures that they allow local disease to fasten on them to the ruin of the general health. Backache, headache, nervousness, point to a disordered or diseased local condition which should have prompt attention.

COURT IN HOLYROOD.

Historical Old Palace in Scotland Being Set in Order—Has Been Unattended for Over a Century.

Holyrood Palace, once the home of Mary Queen of Scots, but practically unattended for over a century, is waking up now, much as the enchanted palace in the story of the "Sleeping Beauty" did when the prince aroused the King's daughter with a kiss. The great kitchens of the ancient royal residences in Edinburgh, in which for 150 years nothing has been cooked, are now in the hands of an army of workmen, being cleaned, repaired and equipped with modern cooking utensils, preparatory to being taken possession of by a staff of cooks capable of catering for unlimited guests. All the other apartments of the palace with the exception of two or three which will be left undisturbed on account of their historical interest, also are being refurbished and refitted in the restoration of their splendours.

All these changes are being made at Holyrood, because King Edward means to hold court in the stately pile from time to time in the future, and possibly may preside, in accordance with ancient usage, over the next General Assembly of the Scottish Peers, known as the "Parliament of the Kirk," held there annually. The last royal resident at Holyrood was Prince Charles Edward, the "Young Pretender," who held court there for a short time in his invasion of Scotland, in 1745.

Queen Victoria and the Georges III. and IV. made short visits to the old palace, too, and the glories of the levee held by the latter sovereign are remembered throughout Scotland to this day. It was attended by over 2,000 Scotch men and women of high degree, who were delighted to find the King wearing Highland costume. Some of the burly Scots, it is true, were inclined to approach their sovereign with more regard for heartiness than for strict court etiquette, but George IV. had a sense of humor, and was considerably more tickled than offended by his guests' bluntness.

It was at Holyrood that Darnley, the husband of Queen Mary, had Rizzio murdered, and it was in the little house near by that he himself was blown up with gunpowder as he lay ill in bed with smallpox, a proceeding in which his royal spouse was popularly supposed to be implicated, as she had sworn to avenge her secretary. The royal apartments at the palace, with the exception of the Queen's bedchamber, have been occupied of late by the hereditary keeper of the palace, as he is called.

In these rooms few alterations will be made. The Queen's sleeping room never has been disturbed. It contains her great four-poster bed, canopied and hung with rich curtains, as well as several articles of old-fashioned furniture, and its walls are hung with tapestry, part of which conceals the small door leading to the flight of stairs that the Queen used in going to and from prayers in the abbey, which now stands in ruins beside the palace. Up this narrow stairway crept the band of assassins whom Darnley hired to make away with Rizzio. The King himself led them into his wife's cabinet and held the queen firmly while her secretary was done to death. The murderers stabbed him 56 times with their daggers.

The folk who live in the neighborhood of the palace affirm positively that the spirit of the beheaded Queen makes nightly visits to the scene of her former activity, and this romantic belief is substantiated by the remarkable experience of the late Countess of Eglinton. The countess that she not only saw the Queen, but had a long interview with her. The countess, who was, by the way, an ardent spiritist, got permission to spend a night in the apartments of the long dead royal lady, and she related afterwards that as the moon was shining brightly she determined to visit Mary's old chapel, and did so by ascending the famous, winding staircase and going on to the ruined altar before which Darnley and the Queen were married.

At that moment the Queen appeared before her and addressed her at some length on the subject of her sufferings while in the flesh, being apparently not at all incommenced in conversing by the fact that she carried her head in one hand. The countess was so struck by the way in which the Queen defended herself against the charges history makes against her that she wrote a book about the interview and presented a copy of it to Queen Victoria, who remarked to her friend, Lady Ely, that she found it very interesting and "so amusing."

Clergyman Who Won Victoria Cross.

The Rev. James Williams Adams, V.C., Vicar of Stow Bardolph, whom the King has appointed to be one of his Chaplains in Ordinary, in place of the new Bishop of Durham, is famous as "the only clergyman who ever won the Victoria Cross." He was an army chaplain, and had accompanied the 9th Lancers towards Cabul to avenge the murder of Sir Louis Cavagnari. At the battle of Charasiah, in 1879, he saw a wounded Lascar retreating, whom he helped. While he was doing this his own horse bolted. The chaplain had then to make his way back on foot, exposed to a murderous fire. On his way he heard a great splashing at the bottom of a deep cutting, and saw two Lascars there, unhorsed, struggling in deep water. With the Afghan bullets whistling over his head, the brave parson waded into the stream, pulled both men clear of their plunging horses, and set them firmly on the bank. All three got safely back to camp.

Fought Here in 1812-14.

One of the most distinguished of British naval commanders who fought on our lakes during the war of 1812-14 was Commodore Daniel Pring. Entering the royal navy at a very early age, he was a midshipman on board the Russell at the battle of Copenhagen in 1801, and had risen to a lieutenantancy when the outbreak of the war with the United States summoned him to American waters. From Lake Ontario, where his first term of active service was passed, he was removed to Lake Champlain in time to take a part in the disastrous fight of Plattsburg Bay, where, if the entire flotilla had fought as successfully as did the Sisseton, under his command, there would have been another taste to the engagement. Ultimately he was promoted to the West Indian station, where he died of yellow fever, off Port Royal, Jamaica, on November 29, 1847.

A Story of Tennyson.

There is a story of Tennyson told by a man of letters still living, says M.A.P. He had gone down to see Tennyson at his home in Haslemere, and the two friends went out for a walk. They had not gone far when they saw two other pedestrians approaching. Tennyson got very excited, exclaimed that these creatures would stare him out of countenance, and put his great flowing cloak—a garment he much affected—around his face, so as to partially conceal it from their irreverent and common gaze. But the tourists, unconscious of the great presence they were passing, walked on, and they did not even look, and then Tennyson turned with a look of anguish and surprise on his face and said, "Why, they didn't look at me!"
