The Ghost at Grayson.

Of course every one knows that a bride does not appear in society for a few days before her wedding. But when it is necessary for her to do a few errands for herself she is allowed to go and come like other folks.

Miss Mabel Downey was to be married on Wednesday, to Mr. Arthur Grayson, of Grayson Hall, some miles down the Hudson. Mr. Grayson was a widower, rich, good, and a thorough gentleman; every one pronounced it a splendid match.

On Tuesday, Miss Downey was obliged to do a little shopping, which she would trust to no one but herself. It was early in autumn, but chilly and windy, and as it began to sprinkle slightly, Mabel took refuge in a street car on her way home.
And when she found herself seated next to two ladies whom she knew she was glad of the thick veil and long gray circular which prevented them from recognizing her.

Of course she could not help overhearing their conversation, and in a few minutes she found she was herself the subject of discussion.

"It will be a very grand affair, no doubt," said one; "but if it was I—and to live at Grayson Hall—no I think I'd not like it!"

"I heard something of that rumor," said the other. "Was it really?"

"Oh, I don't know! Only they say—and it is told for truth—that something haunts the place—a woman, all dressed in white, is seen walking of nights."

"You don't say so? Do they know who it seems to be?"

"Oh, well, I can't say. But it is thought that it is the spirit of Mr. Grayson's first wife."

"My gracious, I never heard that!
Why should she, I wonder?"

"Come back? Nobody knows. Some promise he hasn't kept, something not done, they do say. But I don't know."

"It's dreadful, isn't it? I wouldn't go there for anything!"

"Nor I. His money couldn't tempt me.
But some folks are so mercenary. Here, we are passing our corner. Please ring the bell for us, sir. (To a gentleman opposite). Thank you, sir. Come, Ellen."

The ladies got out.
Mabel rode two squares further, amused, vexed, half-worried, half-provoked over the silly talk she had heard.

"Of course there is not a syllable of truth in it," said she, mentally. "I shall not insult Arthur by ever speaking of it.
But I do wish people would not get up such silly rumors!"

It had passed from her mind by the time she was in her room, at home, and in the hurry of preparation, she did not think of it again, until after the ceremony.

That was not, as the gossips had averred, "a grand affair." It was a quiet wedding in the presence of a few choice friends, followed by an elegant collation, after which, the bridal pair, journeyed the few miles to their future home.

Mr. Grayson's own carriage was at the small station to meet them. Quite a number of people were there, most of them drawn by curiosity to see the bride.

While Mr. Grayson stepped to the baggage room to give some orders, Mabel, waiting for him on the platform, heard a young girl say to another:

"You wouldn't catch me going out there to live! I don't want any ghosts round my house."

In an instant Mabel recalled the story she had heard, and knew what they meant. But she only smiled and did not think it worth mentioning to her kind husband.

Grayson Hall was a large and elegant mansion, having all modern conveniences, finely situated in the midst of spacious grounds, with a conservatory added, just beyond the parlors.

It was managed by a faithful housekeeper, who had lived there for eight years, and an ample force of servants.
Mabel found she had no care to worry her, for Mrs. Johnson was a thoroughly capable manager, and a nice, sensible woman.

Rachel, who was Mabel's own maid, was a neat, tidy girl, and soon grew warmly attached to her mistress.

But Mabel quickly noticed that not one of the servants would venture outside of the house alone at night, and two or three times she heard whispers, which convinced her that the ghost story was known here, too.

But it was not openly spoken of, until one morning, Netty, the youngest of the servants, came to Mabel, and said she wanted to give notice to leave as soon as her month was up.

"Why are you dissatisfied, Netty?" asked Mrs. Grayson. "Are you not treated well?"

"Oh, yes'm, and paid well, never better.
And I hate to give up a good place, but I—I'm afraid to stay."

"But why?" demanded Mrs. Grayson.
"—I'm afraid of the ghost, ma'am."
"Nonsense, Netty, there is no ghost here."

"Oh, yes'm, there is! I never really believed it, 'till I saw it myself, ma'am, last night. And it scared me nigh to death, 'deed it did!"

"Where did you see it, Netty, and what was it like?"

"Like a woman, all dressed in white, and it was out in the shrubbery, beyond the lawn."

Rachel was in the room. Mabel spoke to her.

"Rachel, did you ever see this thing?"
"Yes, ma'am, several times. It was just as Netty says, ma'am," answered Rachel.

"We will enquire a little further. Send Mrs. Johnson here, please, Rachel."

Mrs. Johnson, when she came, laughed at the notion. "I've heard that nonsense, time and again," said she. "And I've watched for that ghost time and again, too, and never have seen a glimpse of it."

"That's true, for I've watched with Mrs. Johnson half a dozen nights, and never had a sight of the spirits. But I've seen her at other times," said Rachel.

"I don't believe there is such a thing," said the housekeeper, firmly, "or certainly I could see it, too."

"Nor I," said Mrs. Grayson. "It is all in the imagination. What you say, Mrs.
Johnson, goes only to prove it. Well, Netty, you are a good girl, and I don't like to give you up. Suppose you stay a month longer. And if, in that time, we can't settle the mystery of this lady-ghost, you shall go, with a good recommendation. You may sleep in the little room next to Mrs. Johnson, if you are afraid. Will you stay?"

"Yes, ma'am, Mrs. Grayson, I'll try it one more month. And if it stops walking, I'll stay for good."

"Very well, Netty. Stay in the house of nights, and I'll warrant the ghost won't trouble you. Now you may go. Mrs.
Johnson, please wait awhile."

When the maids went out, Mabel held a consultation with Mrs. Johnson. That lady expressed her unqualified disbelief in any ghost at all, but gave the rumors as she had heard them, and Mabel found they corresponded well with what she had heard.

"Was there any cause of unhappiness, do you think, between Mr. Grayson and his first wife?" asked Mabel.

"I am sure there was not, ma'am. I lived here four years before Mrs. Grayson died, and in her father's family four years before she was married. She was a sweet lady—very much like yourself, ma'am.
'Tisn't often a place is favored with two such mistresses as she and you, Mrs.
Grayson."

"Thank you," said Mabel, smiling.
"Well, I shall speak to Mr. Grayson about this, and if any mischievous person is doing this to frighten people, they shall be caught and well punished."

"I don't think there is even that much foundation for the rumours," said Mrs.
Johnson. "I think it is altogether imagination."

"I am inclined to think so," said Mabel.
She intended speaking to her husband at once. But when he came home that night, he said he would be obliged to go on a short trip to Washington, and would be absent three or four days. She concluded so say nothing until he returned, not having the least fear for herself.

The wing where Mrs. Johnson slept, and where Nettie took refuge, was at the further end of the house from Mabel.
The men servants slept over the carriage house, but while Mr. Grayson was gone, Mabel had slept in a small room off the dining-room. Rachel had her own little bedroom not far from her mistress.

The night was a lovely one. The moon at the full, only dimmed by the lightest veil of clouds. Outside Mabel's chamber was a light, vine-wreathed balcony, upon which she often went out of a lovely night to enjoy the prospect for a few minutes.

She stepped out to-night, and stood leaning upon the railing, looking out, to the distant glimpse of the river, when suddenly something caught her eye, which caused her to fling up her hand, and utter a low cry. The ghost was there!
