HE WANDERED IN MANY LANDS

"Mr. Jones From Norway, Me." Has Been Up Against It in Every Quarter of the Globe---Has Had Experiences From Palace to Prison---Did Many Brave Deeds and Wears Medals.

(Bangor News.)
A most interesting story is going the rounds regarding a "soldier of fortune" who hails from Norway, this state. He has lived life in all parts of the globe, has had narrow escapes and made a thrilling rescue during the Russo-Japanese war. He has a medal given him by the late beloved Queen Victoria and one from the Kaiser. A United States deputy marshal told the story, but refused to divulge the name of the man.
"Never mind his name," said the deputy, in telling the story. "His name doesn't count as he is probably living a fairly decent life now. Anyway the crime for which he was arrested was not serious and he had so many things in his favor, was so clever in a dozen different ways that it would be a shame to call attention at this time to a misdeed for which he has repaid humanity many times."
"I was given the warrant for his arrest and found him in Lewiston. He was charged with using the mails to defraud. He had obtained a few dollars on one of those schemes which are always bound to catch someone and while the losers deserved their loss, yet he was violating the United States postal laws and had to be brought up with a criminal turn."
"I will call him Jones for convenience. Well Jones was playing in the theatre orchestra at Lewiston and I found him at rehearsal in the theatre when I arrested him. At first he seemed broken up, but after a while he braced and took it philosophically. At the hotel, while waiting for the train, and on the ride to Portland, he interested me with chapters from his varied career. And his career had been varied. He had learned my name and while sitting in the smoker I heard someone in the front end of the car calling me. I looked and looked, but could see no one I knew or anyone who naturally knew me.
"In a minute or so I heard my name called again by a voice that was in no way familiar to me. 'Why don't you leave that man and come down here?' said the mysterious voice. 'He won't run away.' I was puzzled, but made no effort to leave my seat beside Jones. Finally I noticed an amused expression on his face and he remarked, 'Pretty good, wasn't it? That was your humble servant. I traveled with Herman five years and learned many of his tricks.'"
"Arriving in Portland he was immediately arraigned before the commissioner and bound over to the next term of court. He did not get bail and was locked up. I had spoken to the marshal about him and he said: 'I'd put the iron on that fellow. He is a pretty smooth article. I didn't believe that he would attempt to get away, but nevertheless, I asked him to hold out his hands. 'Better put them on behind,' said the marshal, and Jones said, 'it makes no difference to me.'"
"His hands were fastened behind his back and the iron was put on light. His overcoat was thrown over his shoulders to conceal the iron on the walk from the court room to the jail. We went up Market street and just before reaching Federal street, I asked him if the iron was uncomfortable. 'Not at all,' he replied, taking a hand from behind and showing it to me without the iron. He then brought the other out, holding the iron in his hand. 'They don't bother me much. Now I will carry them this way or put my wrists through them, just as you say.'"
"The devil," I replied, "if you can do that every time handcuffs are of no use. Let me carry them," and I carried them in my pocket the rest of the way to the jail."
"At the next session of court he pleaded guilty and when Judge Webb asked him if he had anything to say before sentence was passed on him, replied that he had a few things which he believed the court ought to know, and in clear cut and excellent English told the court a brief story of his life. I wish I could remember the whole of it, because it was interesting, but I don't. Anyway he told the judge that he had not done much harm in his life to anyone except himself. He had obtained a few dollars in the mail scheme for which he was under arrest, but he gave the people part of it. While he had not been guilty of many things against other people, he had done in his life a few good things. He hesitated here as if he did not want to continue. Plainly he was modest and the recital was embarrassing him.
"Go on," said Judge Webb, who was interested.
"Well, your honor," he continued, reaching into an inside pocket and taking a small case therefrom, "there is a gold medal that was presented to me by Queen Victoria for saving three sailors in the English channel."
"They got overboard in a gale of wind and high sea and could not reach the life buoys thrown to them. Jones, who was a sailor on one of Her Majesty's battleships at the time, sprang into the water and kept them afloat until a boat reached them."
"And here," he continued, taking another case from his pocket, "is a medal presented to me by the Emperor of Germany for saving life at sea."

"The medals were carried to Judge Webb by a bailiff and after examining them, the judge said: 'A man capable of such deeds ought not to be engaged in such a petty thieving business. There is a great deal of good in you and I am inclined to look on your offence as a mistake on your part. I will suspend sentence. But I don't want to see you here again. Settle down and be a man.'"
"But this was not the last heard of Jones. One day a magazine article relating incidents of the Japanese-Chinese war told of an American named Jones who, dived from the side of a Japanese cruiser and pushed to one side a torpedo that was slowly moving toward the vessel, and which would have undoubtedly struck her but for Jones' deed."
"The deputy marshal believed that this was his friend Jones and this belief was confirmed a few days later when Jones, considerably the worse for wear, dropped into the office over the post-office. He had left hurriedly over the side one night, swimming ashore. He was tired and at the time and was to be tried by court martial on a charge of freeing a half dozen Chinese prisoners who were bound to be executed. His home was in Norway, Me., and he asked the deputy to loan him enough to purchase a ticket for that town, which the deputy did. Later the deputy received back the price of the ticket and a programme showing that Jones was touring the west as a magician.

THE FUTURE OF LLOYDMINSTER

Main Line of C. N. R. Runs
Close to the Town and Feeling of Isolation is Removed.

LLOYDMINSTER, Sask., Nov. 20.—The main line of the C. N. R., that is now being built to Edmonton passes quite close to the town of Lloydminster. The British colonists who trekked across the prairie from Saskatoon three years ago and made their stake in a section replete with many conveniences, are delighted to find that the latest railway development has caught up and put them on the front street. To have a great transcontinental railway run by one's door is undoubtedly a great piece of luck; the founders of the colony in their most sanguine moments could scarcely have promised with any degree of certainty that within such a short period, the isolation from which they suffered by being away back, should so soon be removed. Construction trains are now running and giving a fairly good service, which the settlers appear to appreciate. The advent of the railway has put Lloydminster in the center of the province. A great deal of brick is being used in the new structures, giving a more solid and permanent aspect to the town. Lloydminster stands on debatable ground, the rich prairie land which divides the two provinces passes down the main street. One moves from the one province into the other without having any sense of a jar. One leaves the hotel in Saskatchewan for the station, which is in Alberta, and the time consumed in doing so need not exceed three minutes. No doubt but in time questions respecting provincial jurisdiction will arise, already steps are being taken to remove the reproach of "drought" from the Alberta division of the town. A hotel is being built and a license is to be applied for and the owner expects to have his restaurant granted because of his house being in another province and under different licensing control. The owner is taking big chances and will be lucky if his project does not meet with defeat.
The new railway station is a fine commodious building and could not be more convenient. There can be no possible doubt about the future of Lloydminster, situated as it is in the centre of an exceptionally fine farming country. The soil is a rich friable loam, with a clay subsoil, just an ideal country for mixed farming. Wheat, oats and barley do splendidly; this year the crops were immense; as for vegetables, their production is phenomenal; small fruits also do very well. As for stock, when one sees the cattle knee deep in the rich, succulent grasses just making beef, with practically no expense to the owner, the conclusion is easily reached that before many years have passed, there will be some well-to-do farmers around Lloydminster. The settlers appear to be doing remarkably well, the most of them came out green; mostly city men, having everything to learn. Few of them knew how to harness horses, nor had they the most rudimentary knowledge of farming, so that their introduction to shack building, driving oxen land roughing it generally, must have been a hard dose for some of them to swallow. A visit amongst them would convince anyone that the colony was now safely over the hard spots, and was now making for success, thanks to the quality of dogged determination with which they are endeavoring and the indomitable pluck that would stay with it, and brave all difficulties. They have entered in to possess the land; had they been less resolute they would assuredly have turned back. Now that they are learning the ways of the country, one finds them becoming enthusiastic in the sense of land ownership affords the greatest satisfaction, it tickles them that soon they will own their own farms, something that they could hardly have hoped to attain had they remained in the old land.
